Happy Coincidences

By KARL GRAYSON

WHL Service.

THIS is a story of coincidental happenings. The first occurred when Aubrey Carroll, a boy, and Audrey Fleming, a girl, moved the same day into new homes. The first on the twenty-eighth floor of the Brewster Arms. The second occurred on the Monday following, when they descended in the same elevator and saw each other for the first time and experienced similar sensations of a thrilling nature.

Aubrey, for example, decided he never seen anything quite so lovely as Audrey, though, of course, he could only hope that that's the way Audrey felt, it not being conventional to ask. Audrey, also, decided that Audrey was nice. She had about her the look of a nice girl, which pleased and intrigued him at the same time. It pleased him because he wanted her to be a nice girl, and it intrigued him because she was a fairly respectable young man himself, and a fairly respectable young man don't approach nice girls without being properly introduced.

Back again at the apartment that night, he looked hopefully at the half dozen people who were waiting for the elevator, but Audrey wasn't among them. In fact, he didn't see her again for four days. It was in the morning, riding down on the elevator, and the way they looked at each other you would think that something ought to be done about the situation.

A week passed. Aubrey saw the girl twice. Each time he felt the same queer sensations, and was forced to restrain an impulse to speak to her. Instead he began contriving again; casting about for some plan or scheme by which he could promote his purpose without it appearing too obvious.

It was at this point that happy coincidence number three occurred. Or perhaps it wasn't happy. At least for some people. At any rate, Aubrey had dropped in one night to that elevator boys all over the city had declared a general strike. This was something of a tragedy, especially for people like Aubrey, who lived on the twenty-eighth floor. Instead of sputtering about it, however, he set out to make the ascent via the stairs, arriving some fifteen minutes later quite out of breath.

Entering his apartment he was considerably annoyed to find the place cold. He went at once to the house phone and called the switchboard operator. The janitor, he told him, had dropped out that afternoon. The fires had gone out, but they were getting them started again as quickly as possible.

Aubrey groaned and sat down to wait. Thirty minutes passed and no heat came into the radiators. Shivering, he got up, donned his coat and went out. In the hall he stopped short, for there at the elevator was Audrey, impatiently pushing the elevator button. Without thinking, Aubrey said: "It won't do any good. There's been a strike. About an hour ago it started."

"Oh," she regarded him woefully. "I was going down to complain about the lack of heat. My radiator's stone cold."

"So's mine," said Aubrey. "That's because the janitor dropped dead this afternoon." He studied her a minute. Obviously she wasn't suffering from the cold. "You'll catch pneumonia if you stay up here. Suppose we go down to the boiler room and see what can be done?"

Audrey's face brightened. "I'd like to do that. I've never seen a boiler room."

And so they clumped down the stairs, and the 28-story descent didn't seem far at all because each was so conscious of the other's presence.

WHO ARE YOU?
The Romance of Your Name
By RUBY HASKINS ELLIS

A Chapline?

THIS name had its origin in the highly prized flag of St. Martin's, which was the standard of France for more than 600 years. It was made of one-half of the saint's blue mantle, which remained to cover him after dividing with the freezing brazier at the gate of Amiens. The story goes that this half of the cloak never showed any signs of decay during the succeeding centuries, even the moths of a monastery being much too respectful to attack so sacred a relic. It was kept in a "chappelle", a place for prayer, and its guardians were a "chaplain", from which comes the name of Chapline.

In England the Chaplains were distinguished and traced their lineage to St. Francis Chapline, Knight of the Order of the Garter, in the time of Charles II. Their coat of arms was granted in 1503.

Isaac Chapline was one of the first of the family to come to America. He had been a member of the king's council and an ensign in the royal navy. He married Mary Calvert, cousin of Lord Baltimore, and they settled in Virginia in 1610. Their descendants gave valuable services to the colonies in the early wars and fought in the Revolution.
