A Sacrifice for Harmony

By RICHARD HILL WILKINSON

MR. HARLOW sat bolt upright in his chair. The psychology lecturer was saying: "And in the normal family, when the daughter reaches the age of twelve or thirteen it is quite likely that her fixation will shift from her mother to her father. They will become great friends, pals. Often this fixation on father will remain until the daughter transfers her affections to a mate. However, if father does not respond to daughter's fixation, the child will, unconsciously, shift back to mother, who, in many cases has resented the original transfer."

Mr. Harlow rose. He made his way down the long aisle, paying no heed to the annoyed glances of other listeners, raising the outside lobby.

He passed there, dabbing at a moist brow with his handkerchief.

So that was it he told himself. So that was the cause of his wife's indignation and wrath and resentment.

In his mind's eye the pieces of the puzzle that had troubled him for the past month fell into place. He understood now what had happened; he could see it taking step by step.

Virginia, his only child had attained the age of thirteen. She was nearing maturity. Gradually, unconsciously, her fixation had transferred from mother to father.

The two had become great friends, pals. Mr. Harlow had been tremendously proud and happy.

Not so Mrs. Harlow. Mrs. Harlow was annoyed. She hadn't understood the natural process of the human mind, and presently her annoyance changed to resentment against her husband.

Providence or fate or something had guided Mr. Harlow's footsteps into the psychology lecture this night. Now everything was clear.

If there was one thing that Mr. Harlow cherished more than his daughter's fixation it was harmony in his home. Somehow, this harmony must be restored, regardless of consequence.

Mr. Harlow's brows contracted. He was in possession of a great understanding, and of the three of them he alone possessed it. He doubted the capabilities of the other two to grasp its significance even though he explained it. It was, therefore, up to him to utilize his knowledge and restore harmony once more in the household of Harlow.

Mr. Harlow returned late that night. It was not his habit to return home late, but tonight there was a definite purpose. Mrs. Harlow had retired, and ten minutes after he entered the house his daughter Virginia came in. Virginia had been to a party, a fact of which he was well aware.

Seeing a light in the living room, Virginia came to the door. At sight of her father sitting there alone she uttered a little cry of delight and bounced up on his knee, with the full intention of providing him with details concerning her evening's activities. Something about the expression on her parent's face, however, restrained her.

Mr. Harlow smiled at her in a manner that bespoke faint embarrassment. He attempted to brush something from his coat but failed.

Thus having had her attention attracted to the something, Virginia investigated and found it to be a dab of powder. She looked at it and frowned. Looking further, she discovered a long strand of blond hair. For a moment Virginia didn't understand what these things meant; presently she looked into her father's eyes and knew.

Horror filled her eyes, a hutlook, an expression of awe and wonder and incredulity, gradually giving way to something bordering on accusation and scorn. She drew away. Mr. Harlow cleared his throat. He allowed his eyes to flitter about the room. He succeeded in conjuring a creditable blush.

"Why, Daddy! Whatever—what?" Mr. Harlow interrupted gesturing airily, saying something about an apology, presently lapsing into a lengthy, but rather stupid, discourse and ending by stating that it would not be wise or necessary to mention the matter to her mother.

Virginia stared. A tear brimmed in her eye and coursed down her cheek. Abruptly she flung her arms about her father's neck and promised him that no matter what happened she would keep his secret. It would be their secret. Poor mother! She must never know. But he must promise—

Yes, yes. Of course he'd promise. It was all very silly, anyway. Just one of those regretful things that would never be repeated.

After awhile Virginia rose and left him. Her attitude brought a lump into Mr. Harlow's throat. But when she had gone he sighed in vast relief. Beginning tomorrow, he knew, his daughter's fixation, out of pity and sympathy, would be transferred back to her mother. Mrs. Harlow would cease to be irritable and resentful. Harmony would reign once more in the household. And sometime, Mrs. Harlow told himself, when Virginia was safely married and away, he would explain it all—and hope that she would understand.

Town Clerics Are Still Heard in French Villages

The town cleric with his bell has virtually disappeared from England; but what corresponds to him in France has survived more generally, especially in the country districts.

This picturesque figure goes about wearing a shabby cap of semimilitary design, and a leather baldric with a brass plate on it as his sole uniform over the clothes in which he tills his little plot of land.

However, he has duties and they consist of village policeman, bill-sticker and frequently bell-ringer for Sunday church and daily angulus.

If the place is larger than a village, the "Tambour" may be a separate official. In either case he can be hired by private persons to make commercial announcements, or to proclaim lost property.

This strange semi-official is in danger of disappearing. The authorities are thinking of changing his professional association from the drum or bell to the microphone, when loud speakers would make his voice heard at each of the cross-roads where he has hitherto repeated his message to the countryside.—Los Angeles Times.

Breathing Controls Moods

It may not be generally known that we breathe through each nostril for about four hours at a time; says a writer in Pearson's London Weekly. The Yogis in India have known this for centuries, and they believe that your moods change according to the nostril through which you happen to be breathing.

Right nostril breathing brings out the positive side of your nature, that is, it makes you feel confident, energetic, and ready to "stand up" for yourself, etc. Breathing through the left nostril brings out the negative side in you, making you mellow, lovable and charitable. But negative does not necessarily mean something undesirable. It is possible with hard work to control your breathing, so as to be in the mood to suit the occasion.

State Highway Maps Now Available

The first summer edition of the 1937 official Michigan highway map is now ready for distribution to the public.

The map follows the general style of the 1936 editions which proved popular with the public. Chief among these features is the improved type of accordion fold permitting easy folding and unfolding of the map.

Other features include the latest corrected information on the various types of highways, individual maps of the principal cities, a mileage table, the ferry schedule at the Straits of Mackinac, the location of airports, state parks, forest areas, and state police posts, an index of cities and villages, and a detailed map of the metropolitan area.

The reverse side of the map is more profusely illustrated with scenic views than previous editions.

This is the first edition of the 1937 map. Others, with corrections, will be available in July and September.

Copies of the map can be obtained free of charge by writing State Highway Commissioner Murray D. Van Wagoner. Approximately 300,000 maps were distributed by the state highway department last year.
