

Fending Off Trouble with a SAVINGS RESERVE

A good reserve in your savings account will take the shock of a sudden emergency like the fender of your car does in a collision. It stands between you and serious trouble.

You never know what may be around the corner of tomorrow to smash your plans of today—loss of work, loss of health, etc. There is no better protection than a six months savings reserve. If extra expenses come up or your income stops, you can go on with the help of your savings reserve. Start now to build it up.

Telephones Scarce, Brokers Get High Prices for Them, in Japan

A familiar scene in Tokyo, Japan, as residents wait in line to try to buy more than 500,000 applications for the 55,000 telephones which the government had available. Since users have to buy their telephone instruments, including the numbers, outright, "telephone brokers" have sprung up to deal in them—at a profit, of course.

In Japan telephones are bought outright, including both the instrument and the telephone number. This arrangement also gives the buyer the privilege of selling them again at his own price whenever he desires. This system of obtaining telephone service has given rise throughout Japan to what are known as "telephone brokers," who profit by supplying telephones to individuals and business firms requiring telephones and unable to wait until the government can supply them. The telephone brokers do a lively business. The prices quoted by brokers for telephones are increasing rapidly,

A Liar and a Prophet

By H. IRVING KING

JACK CLARENDON seldom indulged in facts. First-class fiction of an interesting nature was good enough for him, and this little peculiarity of his being well known it was not remarkable that people laughed and said, "Oh, come now, Jack, give us something easy," when he announced that Grace Porter and Harry Crane were engaged. Jack could not explain to himself just why he had made the announcement; the idea had come to him as an inspiration when he had chanced to see Harry and Grace bowing to each other as they passed on the street. As a matter of fact, the acquaintance of the youth and maiden referred to was only a bowing one. They had made casual acquaintances at some Red Cross affair—for Grace was interested in all that sort of welfare work—and one of those busybodies whose delight is to go about introducing everybody else had introduced them. They had chatted for at least three minutes by the clock about that most important matter, the weather, and after that had bowed when they chanced to meet upon the public highway.

Now Harry Crane had, it is true, been exceedingly taken up with Grace and she had considered him a rather prepossessing young man—and that was all there was to it. Though it cannot be denied that the main street of the aristocratic, little old town had got into the habit of doing so on a certain side of the street and at a certain hour; and that Harry had conceived a fondness for taking a "constitutional" along the same side of the said street at the same hour. Furthermore, if, by any chance, they failed to meet each other on these promenades, they felt, both of them, as if things were not quite as they ought to be—that something had gone wrong with the day. It was all habit, of course. They told themselves so—and they should have known. And the acquaintance had not progressed beyond this—Harry's lifted hat, bow and "Good morning," Grace's little smiling bow and "Good morning." If, by steering gear of an automobile had gone wrong and a car had crashed on the sidewalk near them, or a passer-by had a fit, or some little happy accident like that happened just as they were meeting, it might have afforded an imperative reason for their stopping to exchange a few words with each other for a minute or so.

BUT nothing of the sort happened. And what other way was there to give Harry an opportunity to improve his bowing acquaintance with the fair Grace into a more intimate one? None in the world. He was a stranger in town, a mechanical engineer who had come there to see about setting up some machinery in a mill which, greatly to the horror of the "better class" of the inhabitants, had been erected on the outskirts, and knew nobody that "was anybody" there; while Grace belonged to the most patrician set, was a Colonial Dame, had Aunt Judith's sampler hanging in the parlor and an oil portrait by Stuart of Great-grandfather Porter who was aid-de-camp to General Greene at the battle of Eutaw Springs. No,

They might never have come to know each other really had it not been for Jack Clarendon and his intention to home-made fiction. Jack was a privileged character, knew everybody in all classes of society, even people of no society at all, and was thus able to obtain wide circulation for his little works of imagination.

Therefore it was that "Jack Clarendon's latest" came to the ears of Harry's acquaintances and Grace's friends who promptly repeated it to Grace and Harry. Grace was vexed and resolved to give Jack a "piece of her mind" when she saw him next. Then she sat down and mused. The subject of her musings did not seem to be unpleasant; for she smiled—and blushed a little. As for Harry his first idea was to seek out Jack and thrash him. Then he thought better of it and said to himself, "Engaged, eh? What a pity it is that nothing Clarendon says ever has any truth behind it. In this case, perhaps, the fault lies with me. Who knows but what, if I hadn't been so confoundedly slow, he might now, for a change, be telling the truth!"

The next time Harry and Grace met he did not pass by with his usual brief greeting but stopped her, right there on the street, and made the startling announcement that they were having glorious weather just now." From which they ventured on a little chat, found that they had mutual acquaintances in the city—and she asked him to call.

Three months later Harry met Jack and said to him: "Clarendon, you are an awful liar; but you are a dandy prophet."

The architect, Mansard, was born in Paris in 1598 and died there in 1666. He designed many important buildings and chateaux. The mansard roof is named for him.

Origin of "Dairy"
The dairymen spring from the rib of a woman, according to the etymology of the word "dairy," observes a writer in Horard's Dairyman. The encyclopedia tells us that "dairy" comes from the Middle English deleris, from dey, a maid servant, particularly one about the farm. In Norwegian deia, as in butela, was a maid in charge of live-stock. By derivation, therefore, "dairy" means that part of the farm buildings where the deys work.

The message must go through—even when it has to go AROUND!

At three o'clock in the morning, near Flint, a gasoline truck and trailer caught fire by the roadside. The blast of flames, shooting upward, melted 75 feet of telephone cable—severing 250 important wires that linked Detroit to northern and central Michigan.

Immediately, quick-witted operators began routing Long Distance calls over substitute routes made available by the foresight of telephone engineers. And before it was possible to go near the white-hot mass of twisted wreckage, telephone plant men were on the scene, laying temporary circuits around the break.

This incident shows the spirit of the men and women who service your telephone... Intelligent, responsible workers whose attitude toward the job can be summed up in these words:

At all times, at any cost, your message must go through!
