Few Infantile Paralysis Cases Reported in County

Oakland County has been touched but lightly by the infantile paralysis which has been found in those parts of the country so quiet that the total cases here for the current year are well below the number of cases in other recent years, according to Dr. John D. Monroe, county health commissioner.

Judging from past experience, indications are that there will not be any serious problem with the disease this year, he said.

Dr. Monroe pointed out that there have been nine cases reported in the county since July 9, 1937. "This is a remarkably small number of cases," he said. "For the past few years cases have totaled as follows:

1931-70; 1932-5; 1933-2; 1934-14; 1935-50; 1936-7.

"It would seem, then, that the disease is most prevalent in four year cycles. Upon this history we should not have it to any extent this year, and early record here indicates that to be the case. August usually is the peak month for the disease."

Dr. Monroe pointed out that since there is only a limited amount of positive knowledge as to treatment of the disease, the State department of health has not yet recommended any specific method of prevention.

"Each case or suspected case should be placed immediately in charge of a competent physician, as early diagnosis and proper care are of the utmost importance in saving the life or in preventing a crippling condition. Each case or suspected case should also be reported at once to health authorities," he said.

During the season for infantile paralysis small children should be kept from crowds, he said, and added that a study of the disease indicates that it is unusual among children under one year of age and older than five.

"While there are cases among older children and even among adults," it appears that the ages from one to five are most susceptible.

"But the few scattered cases found in this county thus far are so few in comparison to previous years that there is as yet no cause for alarm. The usual watchfulness against any unusual health symptoms should be maintained, however."

"Among the more easily recognized symptoms are headache, fever and irritability; but as these are also symptoms of other communicable diseases, a wise mother will check with the family doctor at once for positive information and diagnosis. Any child showing these signs should be placed in a quiet room at once and other children kept away. Diligent watchfulness over young children during the season will do much toward curbing the spread of this disease and toward preventing serious results where the disease has been contracted."

Concentrated Food Cube Supplies Emergency Menu

Another scientific by-product of Russian energy in exploring the Arctic, especially by air, was exhibited recently in Moscow in the form of concentrated food cubes, a complete dinner which weighs only six ounces, less than the weight of a present average portion of any single meat or vegetable, according to the Baltimore Sun.

On the airplane flights now becoming common all winter for communication with isolated Russian posts along the Arctic ocean or on islands off shore, one chief problem is food; not only food for use during the planned flight but for reserve in case a forced landing is necessary and the airman must wait days or weeks for rescue.

Ordinarily concentrated foods, such as the pea sausage of Germany or the dried foods available in the United States, are not concentrated enough to suit the Russian requirements. Dried meat or pemmican, long used by Arctic explorers, does not satisfy the Russians because of its lack of vitamins. To meet the situation D. G. Zlatkovsky, manager of the meat products department of the Soviet meat industry, has developed concentrated products, eliminating all useless wastes such as bone or fiber as well as all water and unnecessary mineral salts. Stranded aviators or explorers need merely to melt snow or ice, soak these concentrated foods in hot water and eat their dinner. In a recent demonstration meal in Moscow, a full-sized plate of meat and vegetable soup, a meat course consisting of two veal cutlets with mashed potatoes and a dessert course consisting of fruit jelly were provided by 5 1/2 ounces of solid dried and compressed food cubes.

Nurmi, the famed Finnish long distance runner, is now the owner of an automobile agency in his native country, according to Finnish officials negotiating with the 1939 Golden Gate International Exposition for a possible exhibit at the San Francisco fair.
