PHONE OPERATORS' VOICE
TRAINING SPARES THROATS
According to Dr. Chevalier Jackson, noted Philadelphia surgeon, telephone operators are less susceptible to throat ailments than stenographers or almost any other type of woman employee. Says Dr. Jackson in a recent interview, "I've never treated the throat of a telephone operator who talks quietly all day—there is no need to shout into the telephone."
Records of the telephone companies reveal that cases where it is necessary to relieve an operator from duty because of voice or throat ailments are extremely rare. This is attributed to the fact that each operator is given a course of training in the proper use of the voice, and how to speak clearly and without strain.
