

Twin Sons Help Replace Phone Office Dad Worked to Restore 32 Years Ago

C. F. Hill, center, helped to restore equipment in the Market telephone central office in San Francisco in 1906. His twin sons, C. F. Jr., left, and H. J., right, were among those who recently dismantled the Market office in preparation for the installation of dial equipment.

Thirty-two years ago, following the San Francisco earthquake and fire, young Chris F. Hill was one of the installers who helped restore the historic Market telephone central office in that city. The disaster had wiped out the switchboards and most of the cabling.

The birth of twin boys, twenty years later came the order for the replacement of this famous office, and among the new men assigned to this work were C. F. Hill, Jr., and H. J. Hill, twin sons of Chris. When they had helped to finish the new dial installation, they went to work to tear out the central office equipment which their father had helped to install ten years before their birth.

Broadway's Theatricals Had Origin in Jamaica

Broadway, or at least the Broadway of the American theater, had many of its roots in colonial Jamaica, where as early as 1822 a "public theater" entertained the great players and their families.

Playbills in John street, New York, Cedar street, Philadelphia, or Duke of Gloucester street in Williamsburg, prior to the Revolution, frequently advertised players "From the Theater in Jamaica."

Prior to the Revolution, when wars and rumors of wars began to stultify theatrical activity in the colonies along the Atlantic seaboard, Jamaica, where they found a pleasant haven until the peace of 1783 made possible a resumption of theatrical fare in America.

Plays were presented in three centers in Jamaica, according to Richardson Wright in his book, "Revels in Jamaica." These were Kingston, Spanish Town, and Montego Bay. Kingston had the first regular theater and it drew the largest audiences.
