U. of M. Professor Changes Historical Data

Antarctica, the great continent which has been so much in the public eye of late through the Byrd expeditions, was originally discovered by a youthful American sea captain. This fact has been clearly established, according to William H. Hobbs, Professor Emeritus of Geology of the University of Michigan, despite the belief that English navigators were the original discoverers.

Professor Hobbs has studied early records and maps, both in America and on a recent trip to Europe, and demonstrated at a recent meeting of the American Philosophical Society at Philadelphia that the first person ever to sight the Antarctic continent was Captain Nathaniel B. Palmer, of Stonington, Connecticut.

Palmer was a twenty-year-old navigator who made his discovery on November 18, 1820, and repeated it again a year later when he skirted a hundred miles of the Antarctic coast. Prof. Hobbs believes the Englishman, Briscoe, who later claimed to have discovered the continent, did not visit it until 1832. Palmer made his trips in a 45-ton vessel only 47 feet long—half the size of the American cup defender Rainbow—as a scout for the early whaling fleets. His navigation of this craft in the stormiest seas of the world is a tribute at once to Yankee enterprise and to his ability as a seaman. His log book and maps, studied by Professor Hobbs in the Yale University collections and in a Paris depository, show definitely that Palmer's discovery was credited by map makers as early as 1821.

Each patrol will have a name and several projects to work on and demonstrate during the Camp-O-Ree. The rating of Troop 45 will be based largely on the showing made by the patrols.

Several of the Scouts of Troop 45 are working on their advancement to be ready for the Court of Review to be held June 7, so that they may receive their awards at the Court of Honor at the Camp-O-Ree.

Next week, Wednesday, after school, several Scouts will help secure material and build an entrance to the Camp-O-Ree grounds. Another over night hike has been planned. Several are planning to go to Redford pool Friday night. Scouts are asked to register for camp.
