Visitors at San Francisco World's Fair Take Part in Phone Exhibits

Upper left: Demonstration of long distance service. Upper right: Exterior of Bell System exhibit space. Below: Listening to Voder converse. Above: Sounds to others over the telephone; two tests for acuteness of hearing; and free telephone calls to any place in the United States by visitors selected at random, while other visitors listen to the calls. Also on display is "Pedro the Voder," the remarkable device which creates speech by means of electrical currents.

Most of the Bell Telephone System's exhibits, housed in a special structure in the Palace of Electricity at the Golden Gate International Exposition, are so designed that visitors do not merely look at them but may take an active part in them. They include the "Voice Mirror," which enables a person to hear how his voice sounds to others over the telephone; two tests for acuteness of hearing; and free telephone calls to any place in the United States by visitors selected at random, while other visitors listen to the calls. Also on display is "Pedro the Voder," the remarkable device which creates speech by means of electrical currents.

On the largest man-made island in the world, in the middle of San Francisco Bay, rise the stately exhibition palaces and gleaming towers of the Golden Gate International Exposition, which opened its gates to the public on February 18 and is scheduled to continue until December 2.

Termed "A Pageant of the Pacific," this western World's Fair is but four miles from downtown San Francisco and seven miles from the center of Oakland, Cal. It is readily accessible by causeway and bridge, as well as by ferries.

Built Within a Building

The main exhibition group comprises six great blocks of halls, spaced by broad courts, and providing about one million square feet of exhibit space. In one of these halls—the Palace of Electricity—are the exhibits of the Bell Telephone System. Here, in a separate structure within the main building, are displayed some of the marvels of modern electrical communication.

Nearly all of these exhibits are so arranged that visitors are not just spectators but are participants. They do not merely look on, in other words, but may take an active part in the actual workings of the exhibits.

Calls Show Speed of the Service

The demonstration of long-distance telephone service is one example of this active participation. A certain number of visitors to this exhibit, selected by lot several times each day, are privileged to make telephone calls to listed telephones anywhere in the United States, free of charge, while other visitors may listen through ear phones.

Each successful applicant for a free long-distance call is conducted in turn to one of the booths at either side of a large illuminated map of the United States. As the connection is established, a chain of lights flashes across this map, illustrating the path of the call. Other rows of vertical lights inform the audience in the hall of the time elapsed from the placing of the call to the answering of the called telephone.

Visitors Hear It All

The hundred or so visitors listening through ear phones hear the entire process of establishing the connection, and may listen to the conversation as well—a fact which the operator explains to the called party before the conversation takes place.

When the called telephone is operated by a company which is not part of the Bell Telephone System, the connection is made to the lines of that company, and the call is completed through its courtesy.

Another interesting demonstration which permits the visitor to take part in it is the "voice mirror." The visitor speaks for a few seconds into a telephone, then listens as the device repeats what he has just said. This enables a person to learn exactly how his voice sounds to other people over the telephone.

As in the case of the long distance demonstration, other visitors may listen through ear phones, and hundreds of visitors each day are learning through the "voice mirror" what their "telephone voice" sounds like.

Hearing Test of Spoken Words

Visitors may check on the keenness of their ears by means of two hearing tests, one of which uses spoken words and the other musical tones. Both tests are conducted in sound-proof rooms.

In the word test, the participant listens through a telephone receiver to groups of numbers which grow progressively fainter until they are practically unrecognizable, and writes on a card what he hears. Then, holding the card to the light, he sees through it, printed in reverse on the back, the numbers he should have heard. The faintest number heard correctly gives the measure of the keenness of hearing.

Hearing Test of Musical Tones

The test with musical tones is similar in operation. The visitor listens to varying numbers of spurs of pure musical notes of different pitches and increasing faintness, writes on a card the number of spurs of each note which he hears. Then, by holding the card to the light, he checks his figures against the correct numbers on the back of the card, and thus has a record of the keenness of his hearing for various pure tones throughout the most important part of the hearing range.

The Voder Creates Speech

Strikingly unique among the exhibits is "Pedro the Voder," a device which, under the control of a skilled operator, actually creates speech entirely from electrical currents, without the aid of the human throat. The Voder is the first and only apparatus in the world to do this. It does it, through loudspeakers, by means of vacuum tubes, and other electrical material used in everyday telephone equipment, which are operated by keys, an arm lever, and a foot pedal.

All of these exhibits are the direct outgrowth of research and development work in the Bell Telephone System, or are adaptations of equipment and methods used in conducting normal telephone service.
