Questions should be sent to the Community Commission on Drug Abuse, P.O. Box 48151, Livonia, Mich. 48151. Q. Perhaps you can help straighten out some confusion. I've been told that amphetamines are stimulants. But then I also hear that they have recently been classified as narcotics by the federal government. What's the correct category for this drug?

A. What's happened is this: Amphetamines (that is, certain of the so-called pep pills or weight reducing pills) have been placed under the same controls as the most potent legitimate narcotics used in medicine. This does not mean that the amphetamines have the same effect as the narcotics. It does mean that the potential of abuse for amphetamines is now considered to be as great as that of the narcotics.

The amphetamines are a relatively recent discovery—dating from the 1930s—as compared to the narcotics. It took some time to really assess the overall dangers of this class of drugs. Just as heroin was originally considered safe enough to be used in cough syrups and cocaine was included in tonics, the amphetamines were considered relatively harmless when first introduced. However, in recent years their potential for abuse has become startlingly clear: half of the millions of these tablets produced annually never enter into legitimate channels, and a great percentage of those produced for legitimate use are diverted to illicit channels.

The greatest danger from these drugs became apparent when the practice of maintaining (injecting into a vein) began. The effects produced this way are more profound. So are the dangers: physical and mental damage produced by the action of the drug itself, plus the ever-present danger of infectious hepatitis from non-sterile needles. Inasmuch as maintained amphetamines (often known as "speed") are liable to produce violent and aggressive behavior, the danger is not merely to the individual but also to the community.

The new controls you refer to simply mean that the honeymoon is over. Another "safe" drug has taken its place in the list of hazardous substances.

Q. A boy I know has been experimenting with shooting up various drugs. I've heard about the danger of getting hepatitis from dirty needles and have warned him. So now he's recently acquired a large supply of individually sealed sterile syringes and needles (undoubtedly stolen) and he thinks he's home free. Isn't shooting up still dangerous?

A. You're right. Using clean equipment won't stop the hazards of the drugs themselves—the hazards of the amphetamines mentioned above for example. Clean needles won't keep him from risking dying of an overdose of heroin.

Then too, what about dirty drugs? Any substance injected into the body should be completely sterile. Street drugs are not. One of a number of things that can result is septicemia (blood poisoning). Another is the accidental introduction of some small particle that will not readily dissolve in the blood stream. Such particles are called emboli, can result in what's known as an embolism, and can lead to effects identical to a stroke: loss of certain faculties, paralysis of muscles and limbs. And worst of all, death.

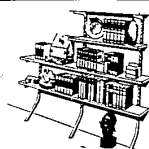

You can tell your friend all this, or maybe just tell him to quit trying to beat the system.
