The Dear House

By RALPH MILLER (Associated Newspapers.)

DEEP in Minna's heart was her dream of the dear house. And then she married Ted Byram and came to No. 1 Peters street, one of a dun-painted row of just-alike uglies.

es. She hated it from the first. Noth She hated it from the lifet roots ing fitted. Wall spaces were wrong, the windows too narrow, stock-size rugs would not fit the floors and the wallpaper was hideous.

Ted beamed at the results, however, while she choked down the lump in her throat to smile back at him.

"Grand little place!" he would "Grand little place!" he would crow. "Old Peters should see it." G. H. Peters, millionaire, in his pink villa in Florida! "Glad you like it. Ted, but we will begin to save right now for a house of our own," she announced

No. I was the dear house, and it also had been the dear house, and it also had been hating full She never knew it until she had to lose it. Smoke and trampling feet, shouts and hissing water, piles of furniture and clothing waterless of furniture in a confect, and a billow of smoke sweeping over the peaked root. She turned and hid her face against the corner tree.
