STATE COLLEGE FINISHES CATTLE FEEDING TEST

Completion of a second experiment in feeding alfalfa silage to fattening cattle has just been concluded at Michigan State College, East Lansing.

Results have been hailed by Professor George A. Brannaman of the animal husbandry department. Heifer calves were fed 202 days on rations comparing alfalfa hay, alfalfa-molasses silage and corn silage.

"Final feed" consists of feed to corn daily for each calf fed hay or alfalfa silage to gain as rapidly as one fed corn silage with one and a half pounds of cottonseed meal. Calves fed alfalfa silage tended to gain more slowly than those fed hay when receiving six pounds of corn. Later, when more corn was added to all lots, those fed the alfalfa silage gained more rapidly.

Comparing amounts of feed to corn, alfalfa silage was equivalent to 187 pounds of alfalfa hay. One ton of cottonseed meal with 125 pounds of cottonseed meal were 186 and 185 pounds of alfalfa silage, respectively. One ton of corn silage and 125 pounds of cottonseed meal with 774 pounds of alfalfa hay were equivalent to 2045 pounds of alfalfa silage and 533 pounds of corn.

"Final feed" consists of feed to corn silage, alfalfa-molasses silage and alfalfa hay, respectively, were 754, 758 and 737 pounds daily gains were 186, 185 and 180 pounds, respectively. Total cost of alfalfa silage and alfalfa hay, respectively, were $14.46, $11.55 and $8.27 per head.

San Francisco Remembers Stevenson With Monument

Tourists to San Francisco are shown the little square at the edge of Chinatown which is the site of the monument to President Lewis Stevenson. Stevenson sat and passed the time of day with sailors, bootleggers and wanderers from everywhere, called the area the "square."

Called the "square," it is a historic spot. Around it grew up the little village of Yerba Buena, later called San Francisco. The town's name was given to the square by the sailor, Capt. John Montgomery of the United States fleet of Fortmouth seized Yerba Buena and raised the American flag on the square on July 8, 1846, during the Mexican war. From his ship the square got its name.

Stevenson was born in Edinburgh, Scotland, on November 13, 1803—just 69 years ago. A wanderer at heart, the trail man, in his twenties, landed on the East coast, then came west by emigrant train. For years he traveled all over the quarters of the globe hunted the square when Stevenson frequented it. Among them the slender writer found inspiration for his tales of strange characters and listened to their yarns. For hours at a time he sat on a bench in the sun, hearing stories about Chinamen, the Chinese and their people. It is said that some of these aroused in him a romantic interest in Samoa, where later he visited and died, at lonely Aiga.

For many years ago Stevenson "R. L. S." with a monument, the first ever erected to his memory. A simple rectangular block of Sierra granite is surmounted by a gold eagle, the Hispaniola of "Treasure Island." A quotation from the writer's "Christmas Sermon" is inscribed thereon: "To be honest, to be kind."

The scene from Stevenson's day hasn't changed much. Today there are sailors on leave, adventurers and the scolding spout they furnish, particularly for visiting fishermen, has only recently become popular over a much wider territory.

FISHING FOR LAKE TROUT BECOMES MORE POPULAR

The thrill of hauling in a 10 or 20 pound Mackinac trout from open lake waters as deep as 350 feet is being discovered anew by tourist anglers at 20 Lake Michigan and Lake Superior ports, as the 1940 sport trolling season reaches full tempo.

Fished with a short, stiff rod, as much as 1,500 feet of line, and large brass or nickel spoon hooks, lake trout require some skill of the angler yet are not too difficult to land. Reels are large to hold plenty of line, which may be good quality linen, or copper or piano wire. Boats, with guides, are hired by parties for the day, or by the hour.

Though lake trout have been one of the principal commercial fishes of the Great Lakes for years, the exciting sport they furnish, particularly for visiting fishermen, has only recently become popular over a much wider territory.

Maine Plans to Restock Their Fishing Streams

Seeking to maintain its claim to being the "fisherman's paradise," Maine has undertaken an intensive program to stock its streams and coastal waterways.

The fish and game department recently released 10,000 four-to-six-inch trout in the coastal county streams and now is seeking to increase the number of fighting Atlantic salmon in its streams.

Gov. Lewis O. Barrows ordered the departments of inland fisheries and marine and shore fisheries, to undertake a joint survey of all known and potential salmon rivers to discover ways and means for bringing back the salmon in large numbers.

The governor also proposed that the U. S. bureau of fisheries convert their Craig Brook hatchery at Bangor into an experimental plant, and Washington has sent a specialist to investigate the situation. The hatchery is working only with trout now.

It was suggested that legislation be enacted whereby the state could take over and destroy salmon weirs and reimburse the owners for their losses.

The state also has proposed that Barrows already is prepared to make improvements in fishways, dams, and to clear streams.

Historic Earthworks Preserved
Unique among the national historic sites preserved and maintained in Canada by the national parks bureau, department of mines and resources, Ottawa, is the Southwood earthwork, near St. Thomas, Ont.

These aboriginal earthworks, which cover about three and a half acres, are believed to have been erected by the Attiwardanok or "Neutral" Indians. When the Attiwardanok were driven from Canada by the Iroquois about 1650 this prehistoric earthwork is thought to have been the scene of their last stand against the triumphant Iroquois warriors.

Recent archaeological investigations, officials of the Smithsonian Institution of Washington have declared this Indian fortification to be the only one of its kind in Canada.

The site comprises the ruins of a unique double-walled fort protected by a double line of earthworks by which access was completely enclosed.

Tree Can't Blame Age
A woman's age may be her secret, but an aged dendrochronologist can date a tree's age in minutes in the field.

Dendrochronology, or tree ring chronology, has been used by Dr. Fred S. Martin chief curator of the Smithsonian's museum, during archaeological expeditions in Colorado and New Mexico.

Basic of the science is the fact that a tree adds a ring for each year of growth. Rings vary according to the moisture supplied to the tree by rain and snow. Wet years produce wide rings; dry years, narrow rings.

By careful study of hundreds of trees a graph of weather conditions for more than 1,000 years has been drawn up. When log beams are found in ancient ruins, comparison of the rings with the mastergraph will show what year the beam was cut.
