"Everlasting Punishment" will be the subject of the Lesson and sermon in all Christian Science Churches throughout the world on Sunday, November 3.
The Golden Text (Proverbs 13:6) is: "Righteousness keeps him that is upright in the way; but wickedness overthroweth the sinner."
Among the Bible citations in this passage (Isaiah 3:10-11): "Say ye to the righteous, that it shall be well with him; for they shall eat the fruit of their doings. Woe to the wicked! it shall be ill with him; for the reward of his hands shall be given him."
Correlative passages to be read from the Christian Science Textbook, "Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures," by Mary Baker Eddy, include the following (p. 266): "The sinner makes his own hell by doing evil, and the saint his own heaven by doing right."

ORSON WELLES IS NEXT SPEAKER AT TOWN HALL.
Orson Welles, who at 25 has singlehandedly revolutionized the American Theatre, will discuss "The New Actor" when he speaks before the Detroit Town Hall in the Fisher Theatre next Wednesday, Nov. 6, at 11 a. m.
Welles comes direct from Hollywood where he has just finished his first motion picture, "Citizen Kane," of which he is writer, producer, director and leading actor. He launched his career by spending a year in Dublin, during which he appeared in 40 different plays. Back in America he retired to the Wisconsin woods where he wrote "Everybody's Shakespeare," a textbook now used in a number of schools and colleges. Thornton Wilder introduced the 15-year-old boy to Katharine Cornell, who engaged him for her tour with "Romeo and Juliet" and "Candida."
In the next few years, Welles produced Archibald MacLellan's poetic drama, "Panic," threw in his lot with the Federal Theatre and started Broadway theatre-goers with his all-groes "Macbeth," his thrilling "Dr. Faustus" and that government bore of contention, "The Grudge Will Back."
His spectacular activities capped the climax two years ago when his "Man From Mars" broadcast, a feature of his famous Mercury Theatre of the air, set a nation spinning on its ears.

NEW TERRITORY ADDED TO HUNTING GROUNDS

Frontage on five lakes and game country in three counties are added to Michigan sportsmen's public hunting and fishing grounds by the latest purchases approved by the conservation commission. With funds from fishing license fees the state is buying 600 feet of frontage on Big Trout, or Wilson lake in Marquette county; 340 feet on Cham lake, most southerly of the intermediate chain, in Antrim county; 267 feet on Crystal lake in Oceana county; 670 feet on Dixon lake in Otsego county; and 260 feet on Lake Gogebic, in Ontonagon county, in a purchase that opens the northeast section of this lake to fishermen.
With deer license money, the state is acquiring 40 acres in Lake county in a much hunted section of the Luther-Baldwin game area; 155 acres in Arenac county, in Ogemaw state forest, popular with hunters of southern Michigan; and 195 acres in Fife Lake state forest, Grand Traverse county, in a tract that includes 800 feet of frontage on Belle lake.
For 450 acres in Houghton Lake state forest and the Dead Stream game area, including about two miles of frontage on the Muskegon river, the commission traded 380 acres of state-owned land in Huron national forest, to the federal government.

BALLOTS, NOT BOMBS

That is

AMERICA

On Tuesday, November 5th, John and Mary Doe and millions of other plain Americans will step quietly into voting booths and cast their ballots.

The United States is one of the few nations left in the world where the voice of the people can still be heard. As a commodity becomes scarce it grows more valuable. Your vote the never more precious than it is this year. Do your duty as an American citizen. Go to the polls and elect the leaders of your choice.

Stars of the Plain

(Exchange)
Like stars in the canopy of heaven they dot the hills and roadside and meadow these gold and blue autumn days. Indeed, star is their name—the twinkling wild asters of the country-side. And they are of greater practical use than their frail beauty would indicate.

Were it not for the wild asters, honey might be scarce and expensive on the open market. This tiny wildflower, along with the goldenrod, supplies the bees with their winter food. Were it not for these nectar-yielding blossoms of autumn, beekeepers would be forced to leave a large part of the summer stores of clover honey in the hive.

America is blessed with scores of varieties of wild asters, ranging from the large, bright purple New England type, common to the Northern States, to the tiny, white, many-flowered varieties which grow everywhere. Nor are they unknown to England, for it is from the humble wild aster that Michaelmas daisies have been developed. Blue, purple, lavender, pink, rose, and white, "innumerable as the stars of night," all are delicate reminders of the Source of all true beauty.

Minnie Likes People

(Christian Science Monitor)
The keepers of the zoo at Recreation Park in Swanton, North Carolina, probably thought they were doing Minnie a good turn when they turned her loose in Pisgah National Forest after thirteen years of life in a bear pit. Minnie had caught biscuits and peanuts and sugared popcorn from front-porch visitors and performed antics for the delight of children all that time but now a spry young fellow was coming to take her place and it was only right to give Minnie her freedom.
Minnie probably delighted in her native environment last summer when she was first turned loose. Blueberries were ripe in the mountains and there was a crop of acorns coming on. Perhaps Minnie had forgotten how to catch fish or the taste of pillared green corn. But still it wasn't like having it handed to you, and when the acorns came, foraging probably wasn't any easier. So Minnie came home. Grown and half-starved, she showed up at the zoo on Monday. Everybody was glad to see her—nobody was any gladder than Minnie.
In her own way, Minnie seems to have knocked into a cocked hat the theory about the "cruelty" of confining animals in zoos. Certain things never are happy in confinement—and certainly it is unnatural to force wild animals to perform absurd tricks for human amusement. But Minnie obviously was not unhappy. She liked people as much as they liked her.

49th State?

(Exchange)
It may surprise puppet emperors and inspire ill-founded scorn to those capitals where puppet emperors get their licenses. But a people numbering 440,000 will expect freely by ballot on November 5 whether it wants to become more closely associated with a nation of 130,000,000, or—and it is this that counts—whether it doesn't.

For years the people of Hawaii have been talking this thing over. Now, for the first time, they will vote on it. Island advocates of Statehood for the Territory of Hawaii would like a vote in Congress; their delegate in that body has a voice in debate but no vote. They point out that the island population exceeds that of any one of four States; now in the Union Hawaii would be well up from the bottom of the list of States so far as assessed valuation is concerned.

Advocates of Statehood feel that the economic position of Hawaii, especially in sugar, might be strengthened if Hawaii could bring more legislative pressure to bear on restrictions, which now permit only a small percentage of its raw sugar to be refined for delivery to the mainland. Riley H. Allen, editor of the Honolulu Star-Bulletin, writing in the New York World-Telegram, points out that the chief objection against Statehood for the Territory arises from the numbers of Japanese now in the islands.

Hawaii, however, is an integral part of the United States system of naval defense. The important Pearl Harbor base is located there. Today, it may be observed, Americans are displaying national interests farther from the Pacific Coast than is Hawaii. Should the voters of the islands come out strongly for a new status in the Union, Americans would regard their plans sympathetically, though in such times as these it would be understandable if action were less precipitate than, say, Herr Hitler's in Austria or Signor Mussolini's in Albania.

Contests for Contest's Sake?
(Exchange)
One may or may not have noticed that the National Contesters Association recently held its fourth annual convention. The dictionary intelligently says that a contest is one who contests. Mr. Willie is a contest, but it would be surprising to learn that they are members of a National Contesters Association.
In this organization the objective of a contest is to win. The contest is an incomplete item, state in not more than twenty-five words his or her reason for admiring some purchasable commodity, discover hidden names in a series of pictures, or win otherwise a prize in cash, commodity, or honor. A little mention. Although such competition may seem individually to the uninitiated, contestants have their own magazines and twenty or more instruction books telling them how to do it.
Statistically, such contests are said to have expanded from a total of $50,000 in prizes in 1910 to $54,000,000 in 1939.
If all bean-zar contestants belonged to the National Contesters Association its endorsement would be valued by political parties, actual membership, however, is some 500 contestants of exceptional achievement in finishing, limbering, finding hidden names, composing testimonials in not more than twenty-five words, and solving propounded puzzles.
These hold that by analytical study of past contests a contestant is well on the way to winning the next. A contestant is mentioned who in three years has won prizes with a total value of $8,000. That, one thinks, must be hard for the average contestant to believe; but there are always more contests to enter. Nor is it altogether the will-o'-wisp of a prize, big or little. Habitual contestants are invited to their letters to one another in their favorite magazine, just like to contest.

A Champion's Choice
(Christian Science Monitor)
What a wise decision young Harold Mason made as to the disposition of the $1,000 he won as national cotton picking champion! "I am going to save it and go to the University of Missouri where I will study agriculture," he announced.
Many a young cotton picker might have chosen to buy a new car, take a long trip, get married, or even to buy a house and a few acres. Harold chooses rather to prepare himself so that he may do all these things sometime.
Perhaps the young Missourian has had occasion to observe agricultural college graduates and their almost uniform success. Probably he never saw one who had become a sharp cropper. Most of them are successful farmers, are successful farm owners, managers of huge acreages, or county agents, who, while never wealthy, have the satisfaction of being engaged in a profession which is devoted to helping their fellow men. The good thing about these college-bred county agents do in helping to build up backward agricultural communities cannot be measured in terms of dollars and cents. They, and the agricultural schools that turn them out, are engaged in a national work of elevating an ancient and respected calling to a respectable economic level.
Harold Mason aims high.
