ded. We ought to choose war only when the alternatives are worse."

Slump In Morale
Whether you are interested in liquor or an automobile or silk stockings or almost any other commodity, you invariably think around the circle until you come back to the central query in America today: "Where are we going from here?"

It is just another way of saying that some of us don't know where we're at and our morale is not what it should be.

Morale is a military word for enthusiasm, and presently it has become apparent to a lot of bigwigs in Washington as well as elsewhere that the public is reluctant to accept wartime sacrifices in peacetime.

As the United States News, edited by David Lawrence, puts it, "If the people will not accept the sacrifices without a shooting war, then shooting war may become necessary to fulfill the foreign policies laid down by this government. A war, with loss of American life and sinking of American ships and forcing of the issue of victory or defeat, would be expected to provide the necessary emotional stimulus."
