Pruning Knife

To prune shrubs and woody plants, use a sharp pruning knife and a short pair of pruning shears. Keep them sharp with a small oil stone. A general-purpose 16-inch pruning saw will handle the larger branches.

Betters Paint Job

While modern enamels and paints have high hiding power, good undercoatings, especially in the case of enamels, will improve the job. Manufacturers of enamels usually also make undercoatings which are carried in stock by the dealers who sell the enamels.

ing shoes and socks, and proceeded to look over the stone walls and masonry that once marked the most westerly British fort on the North American continent. Raspberries and gooseberries were ripe —reminders of the once busy settlement from 1796 to 1812.

It was from this spot that Captain Charles Roberts organized the British expedition that took Fort Mackinac by surprise on July 17, 1812.

Fort St. Joseph was established by the British following the Revolutionary War. In July, 1796, they withdrew from Detroit. In August they evacuated Fort Mackinac. After the war of 1812 broke out, Americans raided the fort and burned it. And so, when the Treaty of Ghent had officially terminated the War of 1812, the British selected Whitney bay on Drummond Island as being more accessible for the Indians. They made a poor guess, as Drummond island, named in honor of Sir Gordon Drummond, the Canadian lieutenant governor, became American territory, while St. Joseph island was included in Canada.

One of the interesting ruins of old Fort Drummond is its British military cemetery. Nailed to a tree is a plain wood board, upon which a resorter has painted the words, "British cemetery."

The burying ground was once fenced in by hand-hewn cedar posts, placed about four inches apart. A ditch was dug on all four sides, 100 by 150 feet in size.

Today there stands only six of the original cedar posts. The others, decaying, have been stacked in piles.

Grave stones have fallen, and of the original wood markers, only one is left.

A summer resort owner has used the great chimney of a British officer's quarters as the chimney for his log cabin. Once the military settlement had its own park. Cabin lots were 50 by 150 feet. Eighteen buildings comprised the garrison itself which once housed from 350 to 400 men exclusive of Indians.

Nearby are the artillery road and the parade grounds.

The quiet waters of Whitney Bay were once alive with Indian canoes, for 4,500 Indians and their families would gather at Drummond Island each spring to receive gifts of the British and to swap their furs for rum and other products.

Since 1828, when the British troops sailed for Penetanguishene on Georgian Bay, old Fort Drummond has been left to crumble in decay.

It awaits the enterprise of the state conservation department or some other interested agency to preserve it as a monument or a state park, a permanent shrine of the last British fort in Michigan and another milestone in our American history of the winning of the west. This opportunity has been neglected long enough.

Diving Helmet

In the early days of the now-famous Max Gene Nohl's deep sea diving experiments he fashioned himself a simple diving helmet from a 5-gallon paint can with an inserted glass window and connected air hose. Nohl now holds the record of walking on the ocean bottom at 420 feet under water depth.

Plant Lice

Plant lice, or aphids, can be easily controlled by the use of nicotine spray or dust. Aphids suck the juices from plants, causing them to be stunted and the leaves to wilt

Cement Clinkers

A new process for simultaneously producing cast iron and Portland cement clinker in rotary kilns has reportedly been used successfully in Spain, Germany, Denmark and Japan, but has not been tried in the United States.
