Two Men Met

on the street the other day and, as is the custom, mentioned the weather. It was sort of a gray, misty morning, and the one spoke up, cheerfully saying it was a pretty nice start for the day. The other could not quite agree — "It was a good morning to stay in bed."

So the cheerful fellow went onto a new subject, politics. He spoke optimistically of the outlook of things political. But the other fellow came right back with some remark to the effect that it all looked pretty lousy to him.

Thus they went down the street taking up one subject after another, and never getting together on a single one.

When they came to the corner the optimistic fellow was just a little less optimistic, even to the point of doubting whether, when he said goodbye, the other chap would be willing to concede him the point.

Wherever two men meet, these days, this situation seems to occur. Never can we agree, not even on a point of general well being of our community or our nation. We have built up a veil of suspicion. Instead of looking at the merits of the idea, we look at the demerits of the man who is presenting the thought.

As one Farmington citizen said the other day, if we could just all get together once, what a wonderful place this would be. Yes, if we could all get together just once, we would get together more often.

We would have the kind of world we all want — the kind of cooperation that makes for progress. We wouldn't always agree, but we would work our problems out on the basis of constructive principles.

It is something that must come from the individual. It can be done, if you talk it done.

Two men can meet — talk — and when they part, feel that they have accomplished a little toward brotherhood and understanding.

World Peace

and security — that star we're all reaching for — that Utopia which at times seems almost here and then not quite.

For those who say it will never be, those who speak of another war in five, ten or 25 years, are only pushing that star farther from our grasp. We will never have world peace if we continually talk of war.

This does not mean that we should relax our security. To do this would only unravel the fine network of defense we have established. We must maintain our military strength and our determination to meet any eventuality.

This may seem rather inconsistent, but what relationship is there between constructive relationships toward one another and military might. One is as necessary as the other, yet one is not dependent upon the other. We can defend our shores and still direct our efforts toward a cooperative union of nations.

At the present time complete trust among nations has not been established. It is necessary that this be accomplished if we are to have peace. When that day comes and it can come, we can scrap our Armies and Navy. However, in attaining this goal we must be prepared.

Strong military forces need not stand in the way of understanding. They must not be used as a means of understanding, as no real cooperation comes from force.

 I love to come to this still place.
 Where deeper peace is always found,

 If there were not this refuge sweet

 And He to me sweet healing give.

BITS OF THIS AND THAT

By ELMER T. POCKLINGTON

ONCE UPON A TIME

There was a time when men would boast
 About which one could do the most;
 Which one possessed the greatest skill,
 From honest work they got a thrill.

But times have changed and now we find
 The boasting of another kind;
 How little done, — how much obtained,
 How little given, how much gained.

It's competition that can give
 The joy that makes men want to live.
 When pay-checks are the only goal
 A job becomes a dismal role.

"Certainly the new feed order isn't going to curtail milk production anything like 50 per cent, as has recently predicted in Michigan. In our own case, we recently used soybean feeding as a substitute for protein supplement, and the result was about 10 per cent decline in milk production."
