once so black and belilcose. This season in the nation's capitol start as merry a moment as it is in most cities, for this is a city of transplanted folk, most of whose homes are too far distant to be reached on a short leave or via the restricted purse that is the portion of most government workers. As I write, the President expects to journey back to Missouri- and his own family circle. Many of the officials will do likewise.

WHITE HOUSE A CENTER OF FESTIVITY
In other years there have been more festive Christmases.

The little ceremony which be came a custom during the Roosevelt regime when the President was driven out into the crowd about the municipal tree where he touched the button that illumined it has been discontinued. That event which 'even many a lonely inhabitant to the crowded square served to bring a holiday touch to Christmas Eve and the knowledge that the President later on would be surrounded by children and grandchildren while he read the 'Christmas Carol' was a 'a rather cheering' was a 'a rather cheering'.

Back in 1892 when Benjamin Harrison spent his last Christmas in the White House there was no pretime the White House there was no pretime the high point of the celebration around the tree in the library was the recliation of German poems, taught them by their governess, by the Harrison grandchildren, Ben and Mary.

That was a real children's hour and we have a careful account in the Washington Star of that date to authenticate it. (No nylons or mink coats were mentioned.) "There is a complete the complete of the star of the complete of the comple

After all, it is the children who make Christmas, for Christmas was made for them and it is by their grace that we oldsters can relive it over through them.

This was credited as being the largest largesse ever distributed by a president. President McKinley always gave turkeys to the married employees, but not as many or as big ones; the Franklin Roosevelts always had some souvenirs for the White House staff.
