KEEPING RECORDS OF FARM BUSINESS EASY, IMPORTANT

Five minutes a day keeping farm records is the best spent time in all farming operations according to Michigan farmers who have had experience with simplified farm account books.

E. B. Hill, head of the farm management department at Michigan State college, reports an increasing number of farmers using the farm account system developed by MSU specialists. "Farmers who once got in the habit of keeping the book say it is an easy task. They say the time spent keeping farm records is the most profitable five minutes of the days work," Hill explains.

The start of the new year is an excellent time for farmers to begin keeping records. Many farmers have found their wives so interested in the farm account plan that they keep the records. Keeping the books handy to the dining room table, makes possible the making of entries each day after the evening meal.

The real value of farm account books is that the farmer knows what phases of his farming operation are paying off. Also of importance is the fact that figures are available to accurately figure income taxes. Records also greatly improve the efficiency of farming operations and add to the interest in the farm business.

The Michigan Farm Account Books are available from county agricultural agents or from the farm management department at Michigan State college. They are made available to farmers at the cost of printing. There are two types of books. The brown book is especially adapted for those who have found it difficult to keep records in the past. The blue book, while not difficult, is especially helpful for the farmer who desires to make a farm business analysis.

Ancient Varnish
Varnish, made by the Egyptians for use on their mummy cases, was another of the earliest recorded products to bear any marked though superficial similarity to the highly specialized varnishes made by modern producers of technical finishes. Legend has it that their varnish took its name from Bernice, a dazzling blonde queen of Egypt, 2300 years ago, who in fulfillment of a vow to Venus, with the stipulation that her husband, the king, come home safe from war, sacrificed her golden tresses upon the altar in the temple of the goddess. For thousands of years, the king, come home safe from war, sacrificed her golden tresses upon the altar in the temple of the goddess. For thousands of years, the king, come home safe from war, sacrificed her golden tresses upon the altar in the temple of the goddess.
