DISCUSS BRITISH LOAN TERMS

The Old AAA Traveler

Grand old Chief Carl Standingdore, his face wrinkled like ancient parchment, but his spine as straight as in the days when he soldiered together along the Mexican border, looks out over the green mountains from the eminence of Clingmans Dome and speaks:

"It's easy to see why Tsali was willing to die that his brothers might live in this land of beauty." Carl, of course, is referring to the blood sacrifice made by Tsali, a minor chief of the Cherokees, more that a century ago; the sacrifice by which a certain number of Cherokees were permitted to remain in the Great Smokies, the Great Smokies they had so named because of the blue haze around their peaks. The story of Tsali's sacrifice goes back to the day when the government decided to remove the Cherokees from their beloved mountains to the bleak wastes of a western reservation. The Cherokees were herded into stockades against the day when the long march to the West was to start, the march which was a journey of death for the Cherokees. As the red men were herding out of their hills a little band revolted and there was a sharp fight. Cherokees died and soldiers also died in the flash battle, but Tsali and the small band escaped and fled into the mountains, finding ultimate sanctuary in a cave up Clingmans Dome way. The other Cherokees were driven into the West and then the troops returned to fare it out with Tsali and his little band. They could not present records of the individuals. They are used also in studies of sire and dam inheritance and as criteria for formulation of the station's breeding program. For the tests of three-year-olds the department's horse specialists have devised specific trials to measure the walking and trotting gaits and the horses' endurance in harness and under the saddle.

Always versatile, the Morgan was as chippy when he went to the meeting house on Sunday pulling the surrey with the fringe on the top as it was weekdays when it could drag a log to the sawmill which often took a team of its big brothers to budge. And where buggies are still used, you'll often find a Morgan between the shafts. He is used on the trail, too, for his forte these days seems to be under the saddle.

The Morgan horses have found homes for from the shadows of the native Green Mountains and today the stock probably is increasing more rapidly in California than anywhere in the East. I regret to say that on our last trip to Vermont, this summer, though mighty Mount Mansfield looked up at the heavens with the same stern profile that it did when I first patted, patting to its top, the maple sugar tasted as good (though it cost too much), the mist still held the peak of Killington as gently as ever in its graceful fingers. But I missed the quick tattoo of those small, strong hooves on the hard highways, and the silhouette of an arched neck against the sky above a mountain pasture.

I'm glad that Uncle Sam is doing his part in the shadow of Justin's statue, to perpetuate the breed that is "just like us," as Joel said:—American.

behind the wicket is Kay Dean, a Cherokee girl who is the answer to an artist's prayer. The Cherokees are avid correspondents, and that is natural, for when the whites came in more than a century ago, they found that grand old Chief Sequoia had created a Cherokee alphabet and had taught his people to use it. That high incidence of education has continued through the years, for today there is an excellent school on the reservation, a school from which a great many of the Cherokee students go to college.

Right now Ross Caldwell and some of the other leaders are planning a great Cherokee Ceremonial for the late summer of 1948. They plan to make the ceremonial available in size and color to the western ceremonials and to Michigan's own Ottawa ceremonials.
