ATOMIZERS USEFUL IN ROOTING OF SOFTWOOD CUTTINGS

"Moisture-laden air in the greenhouse is important to keep softwood cuttings fresh and unwilling until rooting has taken place and the plants are well established," declare F. L. O'Rourke and J. E. Moulton of the Michigan State College Department of Horticulture. A high degree of relative humidity and a film of moisture on the foliage will cool the leaf tissue and reduce the loss of water in the plant's "breathing process," they explain.

Although mist as a means of humidification in propagation greenhouses has been in use for a number of years, a new type of atomizer for this operation is described by the specialists. They use brass nozzles that have separate openings for the entry of compressed air and water. The compressed air blows over the water in such a way as to force it out as finely divided mist through three holes on the other side of the nozzle. Compared with other types of nozzles, the Michigan State horticulturists say these have done very little clogging.

Two parallel one-half inch pipes, one for air and one for water, were mounted just under the ridgepole of the hush green house. Three nozzles were placed along this line approximately three and one third feet apart. Ten pounds or more of air pressure may be used with these atomizers, the specialists maintain, but the water pressure is not important. The water line may be attached to any standard tap. The amount of water delivered is controlled by a valve so that any quantity from one to twelve gallons per nozzle per hour is delivered.

The horticulturists report that experiments were conducted with tender softwood cuttings of 15 species and survival was 100 per cent. As a further test, some cuttings were not inserted into the growing media but left lying on top of it for a period of six weeks during June and July. At the end of that time they remained fresh and green. Cuttings of several species of greenhouse plants developed profuse roots when laid on wire screens beneath the atomizers. During all of the experiment, the specialists report that the greenhouse was kept tightly closed and the glass was shaded with a water paint compound.
