No Newcastle Cure

Irradiation of pens by ultra-violet lamps is not an effective way to protect poultry from Newcastle's disease or infectious bronchitis. It was found at Cornell University. The conclusions drawn from the experiments are that ultra-violet light is ineffective in prevention or transmission of the disease except where every bit of air can be exposed to it under controlled conditions. In addition, there must be no contact with caretakers, vermin, equipment or droppings. Such conditions are impossible to achieve on a practical basis.
