

The Bachelor Party

This is your opportunity to be the host with the most and still survive to marry.

Before the wedding, you'll almost certainly be very busy. Your parents may give a party to introduce your fiancée to their friends. Your friends will get in-line to "shower" good things on you both. Her friends will throw a party for your fiancée. But you are the "king-pin" at the bachelor dinner unless your friends steal the move from you.

You are not bound to finance the bachelor dinner -- but you may do so if you're sufficiently loaded. Chances are your friends will rally 'round and foot the bill. But if this doesn't happen, or you insist on carrying the ball, then here's what's ahead of you:

You must first let the male members of the wedding party know the date of the "happening." It's best to hold it well before the day of the wedding. If you want to swell the attendance, invite the husbands of the bride's attendants.

Leave the "minor" details to the best man. It's up to him to arrange a private room in a hotel or club and enlist a professional caterer to provide the food and drink.

Make sure you arrive first. You can then put your presents to ushers and best man at their places at the table. Station yourself at the entrance to the rooms. As your friends file in, greet them joyfully. (This riot is costing you, so enjoy every minute of it!)

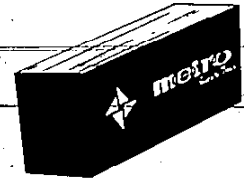

Your place is at the head of the table. During the evening, when the noise level has sunk to a low roar, propose the first standing toast to the bride--with champagne. "To the bride" is sufficient. It's a solemn moment. You're toasting your bride in absentia. After the toast is drunk, dash your glass against the fireplace. The others will follow suit. It's a gallant gesture which will swell all manly chests with pride. If there is no suitable target, simply snap the stem -- so that the glass may never be used for a less worthy purpose.

After the toast, signal the celebration to begin again. Continue into the wee hours.
