People on vacations must guard against contracting undulant fever, a University of Michigan doctor warned.

Dr. Herbert R. Morgan, associate professor of epidemiology in the University's School of Public Health, said this disease is particularly prevalent in the dairy states of the Middle West.

"The illness may be acquired by using non-pasteurized milk, or eating butter and cheese made from unpasteurized milk or cream, according to the doctor, who is also assistant professor of internal medicine in the Medical School.

People on vacations must guard milk, butter or cheese from a farmer because it is rich and fresh, instead of getting these foods from a firm that pasteurizes them," he said.

Not only may raw milk or foods be dangerous when they are fresh, the doctor pointed out, but the organism causing undulant fever can result in an infectious stage in milk for days and several months in cheese and butter.

Undulant fever may also be acquired by direct contact with infected animals. Dr. Morgan continued: "Farm workers must take precautions if they help in delivering the young of these animals, for that is when contact with the bacteria is likely to occur. Short-sleeved rubber gloves should be worn to protect against contact with the disease organism.

Three different kinds of bacteria cause undulant fever, Dr. Morgan says. One is found most frequently in cattle, another in goats and a third in hogs. Recent investigations, however, show that these different kinds of bacteria are not "class contagious" and may appear in any of the three types of animals.

The first symptoms of the disease in humans may pass for a minor illness, the doctor declared. You may count on the contrary (feeling fine and become seriously ill) months after you have forgotten about eating unpasteurized (foods).

Diagnosis may be elusive, for the disease can resemble typhoid fever, influenza, rabiet fever or

The Coccill Willets were off to a lake for the Fourth of July week end.

Arthur Muir was in northern Michigan over the week end, and Jimmie Muir spent last week end with an uncle and aunt in Dearborn.

The Ault family reunion was held through the Fourth of July week end. About 50 attended, some coming from distant points. The branch of Aults in this community are descended from Valentine Ault, who came to America from Bern, Switzerland, during the early part of the 18th century.

Mr. and Mrs. Herman Schult and sons, Alfred and Jimmy, were fishing in northern Michigan over the week end.
