Savings From Home-Frozen Meat Depend On Careful Purchasing

By MRS. LYMAN BUSH
When buying meat for home freezing, the main points to know are meat itself and market prices. In other words, know what retail prices are on small cuts, as well as wholesale prices on whole, half, and quarter animals. Compare the prices of the quarter or half against the retail small piece prices before buying.

The big saving is made by buying (wholesale if possible) the larger sections. The wholesale price on the large pieces is about the same as the retail price on small cuts. And remember that in a half a beef, for instance, you will have every cut from the most expensive steak to the cheaper short rib roast all for one flat price per pound. When buying this way, you will be able to enjoy any cut of steak desired at least once a week, as well as standing rib roasts, etc.

If you're buying beef by the quarter, be sure to choose the right one. If your family prefers roasts, steaks, and hamburger, take a front quarter. If you prefer mostly steaks, then take the hind quarter. The price variation between the two will range from two to eight cents per pound depending on market conditions. The hind quarter is the most expensive.

But don't forget; in buying whole-sale beef, the price should be about the same for the whole piece as retail prices on the cheaper cuts. It has to be for you to make a saving. This applies to pork, veal, and lamb, too.

In buying lamb, if lamb chops and leg of lamb are desired, choose a spring lamb. If lamb steaks, patties, etc., are desired, older sheep will be satisfactory and somewhat cheaper.

PACKAGING MEAT
Meats are best if wrapped and sealed in cellophane (either a flat iron or special hot-sealer can be used) before being packaged in freezer wrap and sealed with tape. Pulling a length of stockinette tubing over the article is also good because the stretchy stockinette flattens air pockets. It's important to make the wrapping fit closely to eliminate those air pockets and stop freezer burn.

Freezer burn is a gray or brown mark on the frozen article caused by the presence of dry, very cold air. They can be eliminated most easily by cellophane and stockinette.

Stockinette can be purchased in 100 foot rolls to be cut as needed. Butcher's wrap, as discussed in last week's article, can also be used for the final wrapping of some pieces.

CUTTING MEAT
It is far wiser to cut and wrap meats in the size required for your family needs than to freeze first and cut afterwards.

There is nothing saved by wasted space, so trim meat as you would for immediate table use. Boned and salted roasts save space, as does cubing stewing meat, etc.

All bones may be saved, and if freezer space permits, a few choice soup bones may be packaged and frozen.

The rest may be covered with cold water and cooked until all juices are extracted. The broth may then be canned, adding all particles of lean meat taken from the bones. If this method is followed, you will find there will be little waste from your meat. Even the broth can be condensed down, packaged, and frozen if freezer space permits.

STORAGE PERIODS
(Save this chart, it will not be repeated.)
All raw meat, not ground: 12 months.
Ground beef and pork, 9 months.
Pork Sausage, 6 months.
Smoked meat, 3 to 6 months.
Organs (heart, liver, etc., 4 to 5 months.
Poultry, 12 months.
Mackerel, Herring, Salmon, 2 to 3 months.
Haddock or Cod, 12 months.

Mrs. Ralph Fletcher, 21515 Oxford, gave a party honoring her father's 72nd birthday. His two brothers and their wives were there. The Fletcher's little girl, Sally, has had tough going for several years; her bones break easily. The last time she fell she broke both legs. She will be out of her cast in another three weeks. Doctors say she will outgrow the brittle bone condition in two or three years.
