operation would cost $300,000. So around $600,000 would be available the first year to retire bonds.

To review the plan, the financing would be accomplished by $25,000,000 from the U. S. Treasury - either in federal aid for highways and hence as a substitute of new gift - plus $25,000,000 in bonds to be paid off by bridge tolls.

At a time when billion dollar treasury deficits have reoccurred with clocklike regularity at Washington for 16 out of 18 consecutive years, $25,000,000 does not seem to be much money.

This thing called "federal aid" has the magic of being everybody's money. Like state aid, it lacks local responsibility; it possesses the lure of being a gift. Both federal aid and state aid infer that everybody pays the freight. If you don't get your share, someone else will. If we don't take money for a local need, then this money will be spent elsewhere.

You are familiar with the ring-around-the-rosy story of tax money from Washington and Lansing. As to the engineering feasibility of the bridge, the revived bridge authority would provide the technical answer.

So there you have the story in a nutshell. As for every project that calls for municipal government spending, the taxpayer - rich and poor - must ultimately foot the bill.
