Mr. Truman understands the American public's desire for one more talk with Russia before going full tilt into a hydrogen arms race. Yet many of his advisers were disappointed when he rushed out an abrupt press release telling the world that the United States would make the hydrogen bomb. They felt that he missed a great opportunity for a world-wide radio broadcast reviewing this country's many, many moves for peace, a broadcast that would put the guns for the arms where it belongs—directly on the Russian doorstep.

The state department was also upset when Mr. Truman hurriedly granted an interview with New York Times correspondent, Arthur Krock, after Krock shrewdly cornered him at a dinner party given by Sen. Brian McMahon of Connecticut. The President, in festive mood, definitely promised Krock the interview, and kept his word immediately thereafter, despite a previous promise to Secretary Acheson that he would make no public statements on foreign policy without state department clearance.

While the state department isn't going to admit this publicly, what it objects to in regard to current White House peace thinking, are two things:

1. The jerky unexpectedness of Mr. Truman's ideas. There is no continuity. The President can be leaving out Stalin one day, as he did to the amazement of Winston Churchill and Jimmie Byrnes at the Potsdam conference. And later he can be telling friends that Joe Stalin is a man who would be reasonable if you could only sit down with him at the same table.

2. The Russians, in contrast, have a fixed, firm, continuous policy—namely, to break the democratic systems of the free world.

These are the state department's ideas; and most diplomats and diplomatic observers believe these ideas are correct.

The inescapable fact is that the 14 men in the politburo, who really make Soviet policy, are not going to change, no matter what Truman or anyone else in the U.S.A. says or does. As previously pointed out in these columns, it is not well either inside the satellite countries or inside Russia itself.
