DENSER FORESTS IN RETURN OF MARTEN

Michigan may soon welcome ome an old wildlife resident, long nome at the winter traces, to absent from these peninsulas.

He is the pine marten, a shy little three-pound creature with big ears, a long tail and a valuable coat.

The Ontario department of land and forests recently reported that Canadian trappers may soon be able to fill a long-standing request from Michigan for a supply of the fur-bearers.

Martens are creatures of the deep pine forests and presently are found in regions of beavy timber north of Lake Superior, in the Adirondacks region of New York and in a number of western areas sad Ira number of western areas of Canada and the United States. Formerly, they occupied much of the Great Lakes area, but when lumber operations cleared the land and brought in civilization, the marten disappeared into what heavy forest remained. Now, however, some areas of Michigan have grown back enough to offer the type of food and cover the marten needs.

If possible, states a letter from the Canadian conservation organ-

If possible, states a letter from the Canadian conservation organ ization, trappers in the Waite River area of western Ontario wil capture 20 to 30 martens for re-lease in Michigan's upper penin tease in micingais super pecusian.

It has not been finally determined where the martens would be released, but a few fraccessible deep forest areas have been considered, including the Forcupine Mountains area and certain other wilderness regions of the upper peninsula.
