Oral Interpretation Cited As Aid To Better Understanding Of Reading

Though most people today read, few can truthfully say they do. In the majority of cases they do not understand to the fullest what the words mean that they have read. This is the thought conveyed by Dr. Moiré Comper, Assistant Professor of Speech at Michigan State College, in the following article.

Obituary

Sarah C. Christie
Funeral services for the late Mrs. Sarah C. Christie, nee Nelson, were held Saturday, October 16, at the Grimes and Davidson Funeral Parlor in Columbus, Ohio. She was laid to rest in the Riverside Cemetery, Columbus.

Sally, as she was known to all her friends, was born in Detroit on November 7, 1921, and moved with her family to Farmington in 1925. She attended Farmington High School and graduated in 1940. After attending business school.

She was married to Ward E. Christie in December of 1942 and had one daughter, Joanne. While here, Sally was an active member of the First Community Church and was active in the P. T. A. and Girl Scouts.

The Christies moved to Columbus in 1947. Mrs. Christie died suddenly Tuesday evening, October 12, while preparing to attend a church meeting.

Survivors include her husband and daughter, her father, N. A. Nelson; a sister, Mrs. Elsie Kirk; and brother, Stafford Nelson, as well as her foster mother, Mrs. Marion C. Nelson; and foster brothers Stuart D. and Howard A. Ruess.

Dr. Comper states that knowing the truth that sets us free has been the basis and the ideal of every group which has worked in any fashion toward a good world and a better life. Knowing how to read has been a basic necessity of that ideal. Those who wished to keep people slaves kept them from reading. When slaves can read, slavery is partially abolished.

Reading, "rhythm," and "rhyming" were for a long time the three "R's" of all education and of the three, reading was first. In America, our compulsory school system, has seemingly created the impression that most people know how to read and that therefore all can or do know the truth. In general, reading is not taught beyond the fourth or fifth grade. We assume that children can read and let them shift for themselves.

The assumption that they can read is false in a majority of cases. Few people can actually read, and by that is meant a great deal more than merely calling words. It is not enough to know the meaning of individual words; it is not enough even to be able to say them. They must be known in all their relationships, in their shades of meaning. They must be evaluated in their context; they must be read together with the words for which they stand. A good reader is one who can accept or reject content readily and intelligently.

One of the necessary methods of learning good reading is the oral reading method which is called Oral Interpretation. This means that the reader must first know the meaning and then share that meaning with listeners. The little black marks on the printed page come alive only through the use of the oral interpretation of the reader. The meaning is imprisoned until it is set free by the mind and voice.

Every person of every age and grade needs to read aloud constantly. If he is taught Oral Interpretation he is taught to share all the treasures of the world. Words become jewels of life. Words for use, weapons of defense when they are shaped into being by good oral reading. Ideas become the property of the reader more readily when they are actually formed into sound. Truth is more readily identified and lived when the form of its expression is shaped into being by good oral reading.

The color and fire and loveliness of the imagery is made more apparent when material is read aloud. Poetry was written to be read aloud and loses much of its color, rhythm and music unless it is spoken. Plays and stories can come alive through the use of the voice. The drama, suspense, fire, laughter and tears are more readily apparent and vicariously shared in oral reading.

No person at any age can afford to cease studying how to read because that is a sure source of truth and power and beauty. Oral Interpretation is taught so that all people, young and old, may possess the entire wealth of the world—its books. This method of reading develops individual personality, makes better citizens, and helps equip our civilization for progress. The method of oral reading is a sure check on the understanding of all students and is a positive way of enriching the content.
