What's Good For Lawn Is Good For Trees

Trees grow better on a untended ground. Where tree roots and grass compete for

Pest Of The Week

DUTCH ELM DISEASE

Benlate has been registered as an aid in the control of Dutch elm disease.

According to Gurdon K. Dennis, district extension horticultural agent, it is not a cure-all. Methoxychlor sprays and sanitation should be continued when adding the use of Benlate to control programs.

Combine Benlate with Methoxychlor during spring sprays before beetles begin to feed. There is a 60 per cent chance of curing trees with Dutch elm disease if they show five per cent or less infection in the crown. There is less than 50 per cent chance of cure if the crown shows five to 10 per cent infection.

There is no chance of cure if root graft or more than 10 per cent crown infection.

RATE OF APPLICATION: Eight pounds 50 per cent w.p. per 100 gallons of water as a foliar spray, two to three gallons of formulation per tree.

Injection method: two pounds per 100 gallons; injections at two-inch intervals and left in place; 24 to 48 hours.

rients, stepped up fertilization may be needed. Most tree roots extend well beyond the canopy spread, and fertilization beyond the drip-line still benefits the tree.

Research shows that typical lawn fertilization can result in the trees gaining from 50 to 100 per cent more height and trunk diameter than trees not receiving such feeding. The tree canopy, a rough measure of shade, may be two to four times more voluminous when fertilized.

Shade trees are often fed by filling holes bored into the soil with fertilizer. It is doubtful that benefits to the tree are any greater for this method than by spreading fertilizer over the lawn beneath the tree. It is certainly more economical to spread a fertilizer with a lawn spreader than it is to dig fertilization holes. Incidentally, the latter stimulates tufts of grass growth at the expense of lawn uniformity.

Slow-release lawn fertilizers have much to recommend them for trees as well as grass, and should cause less lawn pocking when fertilizer is buried.
