An Arbor Arbor of the feederal implication in the Watergale affair, according to two University of Michigan law professors. Profs. Terrance Sandalow and Robert A. Burt, both specialists in constitutional law and the operations of the federal judiciary, note that a frefusal by President Nixon to release tapes subpoenaed by the Senate Watergate Committee could prompt, the committee to seek a "declaratory judgment" by the courts, clarifying the question of executive privilege. A less likely alternative, they say, is a contempt clation by the Senate and a federal court suit against the President. But the professors maintain there is no legal precederic executive privilege. A less likely alternative, they say, is a contempt clation for the courts to duck the issue altogether," on the grounds that the broad constitutional and philosophical implications of Watergate extend beyond the scope of the Supreme Court and other federal courts. He also notes the likelihood of prolonged, court delays, which would serve to remove the question of Presidential involvement from the public's eye until the controversy had eased. In fact, Sandalow observes, it might be to the President's advantage if be himself sough a "declaratory judge ment" from the courts on the question of accepting professor more special to the president and take in initiative in resolving the Watergate affair. Prof. Burt is much more optimistic about the possibility of court action on Watergate questions. "The basic issue at stake," he says, "is the question of the President's possible involvement in illegal activities during; his re-election campaign.
