Gives Tips on Use of Trees

"Trees can be used as frames and backgrounds to buildings in a comparatively simple manner provided a few rules and regulations are followed," says Prof. Harlow O. Whittemore, chairman of the Department of Landscape Architecture at The University of Michigan.

"If your house is near the street, there usually is no room for additional trees in front without over-shading and crowding. But if your home is back 30 to 40 feet or more, additional framing in front is desirable."

"With a large house it is best to use two trees, one on either side of the house, and locate them diagonally off the corners, 15 to 20 feet away from the corners. If the house is a small one, one tree may be enough, located off one corner and repeated by a small flowering tree of similar form off the other corner."

"If two trees are used, they should be those which have canopy form—spreading top with trunk and branches revealed below—so as not to hide the house, but frame it. Theoretically, the trees should rise above the house and spread out above it so as to encompass the whole frame. A tall house calls for a tall tree, a low house for a medium-sized or low tree."

"Some trees that make good frame trees are American elm, honey locust, tulip, tree, white ash, red oak for large houses. For smaller houses, silver oak, white oak, European larch, red bud, and Japanese larch are good."

"In addition to the frame trees, there should be background trees, located at two distances, first those located immediately back of the house, and second, those at the back end of the property. In the case of a large house, there might be two trees off each of the rear corners, balancing those in front, for the small house, off the rear corner diagonally opposite the one framing tree in front."

"In any case, a mass of trees across the rear would be satisfactory. Background trees can be more solid and with lower branches, such as sugar maple, American linden, red oak, red pine, red gum and white pine as white, Austrian or red."

"The narrower a man's mind the broader his statements," Burton Hillis.

ALL THAT REMAINED of the well stocked and once bustling National Food Store in the Bell-Aire Shopping Center the later part of last week was the outside shell of the building and a few piles of scrap which workmen were cleaning out.

Although only the outside walls of the building remain standing and some damage was done to them as a result of the recent disastrous fire there, National Food has stated that they will definitely rebuild in Farmington.

Library Friends Make W. Brown Honor Member

The directors of the Friends of the Library held their March meeting at the home of Maud Schlereth last Tuesday evening. The Board voted an honorary membership to Wendell Brown for his six years of membership as a director and one, also, as president, the services of his office in handling the many legal reports and correspondence incident to the thirty work of this organization. His contributions continue in this capacity in the future if needed.

The Board also voted to contribute one book to the new Ruth Carlisle Memorial Shelf in the Library. Mrs. Leonard Sidwell reported the Blue Star members' gift of a globe which will be made soon.

It was agreed to prepare an appropriate display of the accomplishments to date of the Friends organization to be submitted to the American Library Association annual meeting in Washington during Library Week in response to their request for a contribution to this meeting.

Plans are being made for a membership meeting to be held early in May, and for subsequent meetings during the present year.

One current project which has met with the approval of the Board of Trustees and which is now being processed, is the purchase of two dozen folding chairs which will be stored in the Library for use as maybe required for additional seating.
