Mich. Bell Has New Telephone

Michigan Bell Telephone Company next Monday (April 4) will offer to the public a new small, lightweight telephone representing the first major change in home telephone design in more than a decade.

The new phone, called "The Princess," is a compact, oval-shaped instrument requiring only three less space than current desk-type telephones.

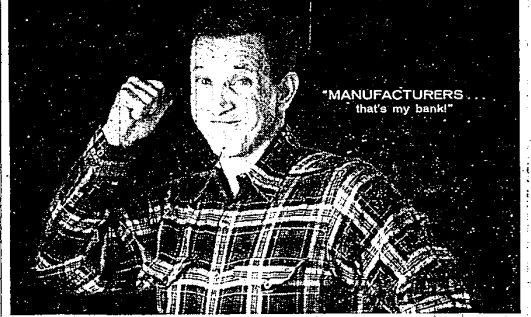

Only eight and one-half inches wide, three and one-half inches deep, and four inches high, it saves five inches in depth and stands two inches lower than its predecessor. The Princess weighs 12 ounces, nearly three pounds less than most current desk models.

DESIGNED to take a minimum of space on bed headboards, dressing tables, coffee tables, or wall shelves, the phone is a result of five years of research by Henry Dreyfuss, industrial designer, and Bell Telephone Laboratories.

The premium priced phone comes in five colors—white, beige, turquoise, pink, and blue. It is equipped with a dial that lights when the receiver is lifted, or glows as a night light if the flick of a switch.

Now displayed at local Bell Telephone business offices, the Princess represents the sixth major telephone alteration since Alexander Graham Bell's original invention in 1876.
