

Use of Automation Gives Professors More Freedom

ANN ARBOR — Future students are likely to gain as the use of automation for independent study gives professors greater freedom.

At the same time, certain education trends — the need for more teachers, growth of residential colleges, improved ways to train assistants — are to grow stronger.

So predicts Prof. Stanford C. Erickson, director of The University of Michigan Center for Research on Learning and Teaching.

"The use of automation for independent study by the student will give the professor greater freedom," Erickson says. "This will enable the professor to meet his students in the more challenging tasks of opening new perspectives, and giving strength to their educational aspirations."

How about technological aids for instruction? "The book will continue to be the most versatile technological aid for teaching and learning," believes Erickson.

library, or the library stacks."

We will need many more teachers," he asserts. "And in addition to faculty expansion we probably will see an increase in the number of residential colleges. Hopefully, these smaller units — will provide a means of adding strength to existing education rather than simply more classrooms."

Erickson believes the next few years will bring efforts to improve ways of selecting, training and utilizing teaching assistants. "The discussion group will probably remain an integral part of the instructional process, and these classes will usually be taught by graduate student teaching fellows," he says.

"College students should have the opportunity in the classroom to express, to discuss, and to reflect various opinions, points of view, and alternative interpretations. The teaching skills necessary to lead a stimulating discussion section may not always require the subject-matter expertise of a Ph.D. scholar or scientist."

Many departments are already beginning to explore better ways to use the teaching assistant as an educational resource for our undergraduate students, he points out.
