GOING UP
'CURTAIN
Like "The Amorous Flea" mentioned in last week's column old Wally hopped quickly into his pastel blue Fairlane 500 and jumped over to New York City where his second theatrical port-o-call awaited his critical eye.
The Persecution and Assassination of Marat as Performed by the inmates of the Asylum of Charenton under the direction of the Marquis De Sade in the play thought his highly individualistic approach was right. Paul Marat, the French revolutionary thought his extremely intellectual approach was correct. Charlotte Corday thought her violent, murderous action (the slabs Marat) was proper and was the solution. Each of us do have our own answers to world problems, local issues, and personal difficulties. Maybe this is all one should get out of "Marat-Sade."
Peter Brooks, one of England's top directors, staged this production so that you were caught up in the rush and flow of frantic action on stage. The actors and actresses exhaust themselves as they literally throw themselves into their roles.
There is no half-way approach for the actors in doing "Marat-Sade." You live the parts and the audience soon disappears. You exist with the inmates up stage.
In fact, when the play has ended, you almost feel relieved that you can escape the trauma and tension you've been subjected to.
Many members of the audience at the Martin Beck resent this play. It forced them to think and wonder about our traditional roles of society. Many were only there simply because suddenly "Marat-Sade" had developed into a "hot ticket" show. And it did have a mode man prancing about the stage.

All the gimmicks of the production fade when one leans back and thinks a second time about the tremendous quality of its writing. Peter Weiss is a playwright to watch and regard respectfully. A few more of his plays and who knows maybe society will wake up and do something worthwhile. We may yet discover our full potential before the blast of the hydrogen bomb.
Alvina Krause, artistic director of the Harper Theatre in Chicago, has the Midwest rights to "Marat-Sade."
Saturday Romp Set
