Try Cooking With (?) Herbs To Add Spice to Your Life

By Faith Gillespie
Queen of Herbs
If last week's thumb-nail farm journal concerning the cultivation of herbs piqued your curiosity at all, you'll be wanting to know something of the magic combinations that can be conjured up with herbs and spices. Let me begin by saying that the object of all herbs is to enhance the flavors of foods, not to hide them. The password here, as in many other areas of a lovely life, is gently. Passion has carried more than one well-meaning lady away in the kitchen (not to mention elsewhere). Proceed with discretion, but don't be afraid. Cooking with herbs will widen your enjoyment of life.

The leafy herbs (basil, sweet marjoram, summer savory, rosemary, parsley, thyme) can be used alone or in combination, dried or fresh-chopped, in most of the same dishes, or adding them (gently) to all kinds of stews, soups, salads, gravies and sauces, stuffings, cottage cheese, eggs, meats, fish, poultry, breads and vegetables.

Each herb, however, may be especially suited to certain foods. A spice and herb chart is an admirable addition to your kitchen; for starters, here is a rough guide:

BASIL: Loves tomatoes, and matches any meat dish that is prepared or served with catsup or tomato sauces. (Put a half-teaspoon of dried basil leaves in the hollow of your hand and rub it to a powder with your other thumb to add to a pound of ground beef for grilled hamburgers. Or add a little to your red cocktail sauce for shrimp.)

SWEET MARJORAM: Enhances lamb and chicken, ground beef, baked or broiled fish, herb breads, creamed vegetables, eggs.

SAVORY: Belongs with beans of all sorts: lima, string, pole, baked, soup, relish, and black-eyed peas; try it also in cream cheese dips, and with rice.

ROSEMARY: Is lovely in herb butters and herb biscuits, is perfect for peas, pork, pot roast, poultry stuffing.

PARSLEY: Linguishes, poor old thing, on platters as garnish, when it could be put to good use, chopped and tossed into salads and stews, soups and stuffings.

THYME: Enlivens any soup or stew, chowder or stuffing, is especially nice in salmon loaf and in seafood salads.

Besides the leafy herbs, you will find chives, dill, and celery seed indispensable (though you probably won't grow your own celery seed).

Dill is welcome in almost any salad, especially potato salad, and for cabbage, cooked or raw. Use the seed or the weed with cottage cheese, fish, boiled vegetables. (Some people even use
