"Never make a recipe for the first time when company is coming," the rule says. "Always try it out on your family before."

Nonsense.

It may be heresy, but I can think of all sorts of reasons why the sensible housewife should erase this rule from her mind at once. It is clearly impractical, if not downright silly.

Company foods often cost more in time and money and effort than everyday foods do; that is what makes them company foods. If they were simple and easy enough to do every day, they would be everyday foods, and your guests might as well stay home.

Several problems are created, therefore, in practicing special recipes on the family.

Who in her right mind, in addition, would rush out and buy a 12-pound standing rib to practice on?

What family of three or five is willing to delve away for several meals on fancy dishes planned for a group of, say, sixteen?

Why labor with trembling anxiety over a delicate lemon cream sauce, only to have the children say, "What is that licky stuff on the broccoli?" (Goodness knows you work hard enough just getting them to eat the broccoli.)

In fact, the unsophisticated palates of the children cause the most trouble. If you have curry-loving friends and come upon a recipe for great curry, would you chance giving it to the children? What a waste! If you want to stockpile their palates, a task which takes years, try them out on the leftovers. (Tell them it's stew.)

Your family knows what it likes; it likes what it has had before, especially if it is peanut butter, or you can put catsup on it.

If eating is an adventure for grownups, why should cooking be also? Love dangerously. Ordinarily your guests will be your good friends. You can expect them to be charitable, and to understand if your husband suddenly rushes out to get Chinese food.

Indeed, the only possible reason I can think of to try out a new recipe before you serve it to guests is that it could fail. You can fail just as easily with an old recipe, maybe easier, because the first time you will be especially careful. No, if you use reliable recipes and follow them carefully, you have nothing to fear... hardly.

Here is a reliable recipe that can't miss; the only trick is in cutting. Be sure to hold your very sharp knife almost flat to the top of the meat when it is done, and cut it diagonally, against the grain, in very thin slices. It serves six amply.

LONDON BROIL, B.B.Q.
Mix together well: 1 cup catsup, 1 1/2 cup water, 1 clove garlic minced, 2 tablespoons prepared mustard, 2 tablespoons worcestershire sauce, 3 tablespoons salad oil, 1 teaspoon seasoned salt, 1 teaspoon onion powder, 1/2 teaspoon pepper. Pour over 2 flank steaks (about 1 1/2 lb. each) in a large flat pan. Marinate for hours, all day if possible, turning occasionally.

Just before serving time, broil the meat 4 to 5 minutes per side, so the steak is rare inside. (This may be done on an outside grill, if you like.) Cut and serve with the sauce on split hard rolls or buns.

Even children like this. They think the sauce is catsup.
