FHS Senior Boys
Air Draft Views

By RON SCHULZE

With increased American involvement in Vietnam, the hopes of many political leaders (including, at one time, Barry Goldwater) that voluntary enlistment could meet the manpower needs of the nation have been smashed. Today, even the proud Marine Corps has been forced to draft civilians.

To find the views of potential draftees for any of the services the Blue and White talked with numerous FHS senior boys who will soon be engaged in the local draft board and subsequent classification.

In general, the majority interviewed looked to the draft with an inevitable acceptance but without enthusiasm and expressed a desire for a change in the system but have no acceptable alternatives. Some, of course, are looking forward to voluntary enlistment. Bruce Carlson, although planning to go on to college, feels that universal military service for all American males at some time during their adult lives would be beneficial, thus paralleling a similar suggestion from former President Dwight Eisenhower.

Others are receptive to the idea of voluntary service to one's country in a civilian rather than military role. In a departure from his usual hawkish stances last year in Toronto, Secretary of Defense Robert McNamara proclaimed that service in the Peace Corps should be viewed as an important part of military service.

He urged that more Americans contribute voluntary service to their fellow man. "The Peace Corps, VISTA, and other agencies probably achieve more than military forces do," was Jim Green's observation. (It is interesting to note that recently a Peace Corpsman serving in Africa was reclassified and recalled for induction by his local draft board.)

This subject of duty to one's country caused Brian McKenzie to comment on conscientious objectors to the draft. "They should not be exempt; they must perform some civilian duty. Everyone must serve his country."

Registration Set For Wayne State
Early registration for the spring quarter at Wayne State University will open Monday, Feb. 13 and continue through Friday, March 3.

New students and those returning after an absence are urged to obtain registration forms early to avoid waiting. Forms are available at the Records Office, Room 150 Administrative Services Building, Cass and Antoinette.

Final registration will be held March 29, 30 and 31, which spring quarter classes beginning April 3.

Students who have not been in attendance for four or more quarters must be readmitted through the office of the dean of the college in which they intend to register.
