College Opens Tech Building

The Schoolcraft College Technical Building was dedicated Sunday afternoon, bringing to fruition one of the goals of the founders of the institution.

Vocational and technical training had been neglected while the more academic aspects of the college's course offerings were developed. Funded in part by Federal money, the building houses facilities for teaching automotive, manufacturing, drafting, metallurgical, electronic, hydraulic and data processing technologies. In addition, a nursing education area was built into the building. Keynote address at the dedication was presented by Dr. John P. Walsh, assistant manpower commissioner, United States Department of Labor.

Walsh predicted that by 1975, every major job category requiring advanced education will need more manpower. At the same time, he said, jobs needing little skill—agriculture and laborers—will decrease.

The commissioner praised Schoolcraft's efforts in establishing two-year programs of study in many technical areas—areas he says will need a fantastic amount of manpower in the near future. "Out of every 1,000 working people, 863 go to work everyday. But we can't lose sight of the 37 left over. Today, there are three million people who can't find a job," Walsh said.

Who are these people? Mostly, the uneducated, people with no skills. And that, he feels, is where the buildings like the College's Technical facility come in.

"We are in the best position we've ever been in to achieve the great society everyone is talking about. There are clouds on the horizon, with many not becoming a part of the modern technology. We envision soon skill shortages, and manpower shortages in some areas," Walsh said.

Continuing, he commented on non-white jobs: "Of the three million unemployed, 650,000 are non-white, walking the streets of our ghettos," he said.

As proof that education pays off, Walsh cited statistics that show only two percent of America's white collar workers are unemployed, and those people are idle only because they are changing jobs, or they have been laid off, or laid up with an injury.

Calling education the "pay-off for the American dream," he called for the use of facilities like the Technical Building at Schoolcraft to narrow the gap between our country's requirements, and its manpower.

"If we add up all the jobs advertised in the want ads of the newspapers across the nation, we'd find more than a enough jobs for the unemployed. Our problem is to match those jobs with skilled people."

Also speaking briefly at the dedication were Dr. Hobart Sommers, regional representative of the vocational and technical Division of the United States Office of Education, as well as Leon Alger of the State Department of Education.

Gene Bails, head of the architectural firm of Halls-Hamill-Becker Associates, presented the keys of the building to Board of Trustee President Harold E. Fischer. Fischer in turn handed them to College President, Dr. Eric Bradner. The speakers were introduced by Jon P. Adams, Dean of Technical and Vocational Instruction.

State Police Road Check Swings into 8 Districts

The Michigan State Police motor vehicle inspection program is now in full swing this week in all eight of the department's districts, Col. Frederick E. Davids, director, reported.

Inspection in the Bay City, Paw Paw, Rockford, Traverse City and Marquette districts had been delayed because of insufficient inspection supplies. The program began March 27 in the East Lansing, Detroit and Jackson districts.

At present one inspection team of several officers works daily in each district, changing check lane locations from day to day. Thirty-six officers originally were trained for this work. Additional officers to serve as team substitutes will be trained, beginning with a three-day school April 15-17 at Marquette, according to Lt. Matt P.
