What We Eat Daily

The average American eats three or four servings of vegetables and fruits; the equivalent of two to three cups of milk; an egg; one or two servings of meat, poultry or fish each day; and bread or other grain products at each meal.

In addition, say Michigan State University scientists, Americans have been consuming more and more liquids, but are tending away from consuming just pure drinking water.

Garden Club Learns Of Hanging Baskets

The Livonia Branch of Woman's National Farm and Garden Association had a program by Mrs. P. Askounas on how to make indoor and outdoor hanging baskets at a recent meeting. Mrs. Askounas showed many types and sizes of baskets and advised suitable plant material.

Food Trend Is Toward Convenience

Hungry Americans last year ate more than $500 million worth of frozen, prepared dishes, mostly in convenient containers that went from oven to table to trash can.

And these expenditures for convenience foods will increase substantially in the future, contend Michigan State University scientists.

The researchers say that consumers will be demanding more built-in services in their meat purchases. Therefore, more ready-to-cook, convenience "heat and serve" or "boilin-bag" types of meat items will be made available.

They expect 80 per cent of the meat sales in 1980 will be in convenience or prepared form.

The ultimate in convenience is afforded by food vending machines, but the MSU scientists say the service offered by these machines may be a mixed blessing. They point out that one effect machines have had is to encourage piecemeal eating.
