

BAROQUE ORCHESTRA and Director Jean Martinon take a bow after all-Bach Fair Lane Festival Concert.

Sunshine On Their Bach

The Fair Lane Festival concerts, on the lawn of the former Ford mansion in Dearborn, show off the music of the Baroque period in an atmosphere of performers in shirtsleeves and an audience on a picnic. That was the atmosphere of last Sunday's first two concerts of the 10-part series.

The Chicago Symphony's Baroque Orchestra today (June 11) will present the third and fourth concerts. Guest conductor Antonio Janigro will lead a program of Italian Baroque music at 4 p.m., and concertos will be featured at 8:30 p.m. Music director of the orchestra is Jean Martinon. The festival series is presented by the University Musical Society of the University of Michigan, which now owns Fair Lane as part of its Dearborn campus.

THE BAROQUE PERIOD

covers roughly a century and a half (1600-1750) after the Renaissance. In painting, sculpture and music, it was a time of irregular and even fantastic shapes. Its critics used the term "Baroque" in sarcasm, and later critics defined it as "anything so excessively ornamented as to be in bad taste."

Baroque was the time of Rubens and El Greco, the Counter-Reformation and the rise of the Jesuits. Musically, it was opened by Monteverdi, Gabrieli and Sweelinck and closed by Bach and Handel, its executioner was Beethoven. LAST SUNDAY afternoon the Baroque Orchestra performed Bach suites and concertos in shirtsleeves. One sweltering violin player said that he was actually more concerned with the effect of the temperature and sun on his instrument.

Direct sun with temperatures in the upper 80s threatened to roast both musicians and audience during the first section of the program, but lengthening shade from the large trees surrounding the concert area brought relief.

The audience seemed to enjoy the unique setting as much as the music.

Several with lawn arava tickets could have been mistaken for sunbathers as they leaned back on blankets or on the rich, green carpet of the Fair Lane lawn and let the Baroque music drift over them.

Picnicking is allowed in most areas of the estate before and after the concerts.
