Junior Red Cross Reaches Out To Help

The Junior Red Cross, which got its start 50 years ago this month, during the First World War, can be seen at work today in Observance in St. Mary's Hospital, Livonia, where nearly 90 teenagers volunteer their time and talents.

They work when they are able, some as many as 16 hours a week. And they do all sorts of jobs—from taking over routine tasks to taking time to talk with patients who are lonely.

Three of the volunteers, Sue Griffiths, of Plymouth; Kathi Lynott, of Farmington; and Janet Mallman, of Livonia, talked recently about their Red Cross jobs.

Janet said that she spent most of the summer working in the medical records department, but sometimes she was able to help out on the pediatric ward. She is considering nursing as a career, and especially likes to work with children.

"It makes you feel good—lik you're really helping someone," Sue said simply. She has worked mostly on the surgery ward, and hopes for a career later in either nursing or physical therapy.

Kathi has been assigned to a medical service, and has especially enjoyed being able to do things for the older people confined to the hospital. "They appreciate little things so much," she commented. "They can be so lonely here."

When the Junior Red Cross was first organized, President Woodrow Wilson asked young people to participate in the work of the Red Cross.

The efforts began when $53,000 was raised to aid American soldiers overseas and refugee children in Europe.

Fifty years later, the Junior Red Cross program involves both groups in schools and individual volunteers, as well as money raising activities.

When a G. I. completes days, maybe weeks of fighting, he needs something to take his mind off the war. There is no country club circuit in South Vietnam to be sure. But he does have the Red Cross clubmobile. Here he can listen to records, play the guitar, watch movies, play cards or just write those long anticipated letters home. The equipment he uses at the center is there because the High School Red Cross made it possible through Project 45.

A young child—all alone in the world except for the other lone children in his particular refuge camp—stands scared. He doesn't know what's going to happen to him or even where he's going next. All of a sudden though, he tries to smile. What happened? Someone from the Red

KATHI LYNOTT

Cross presented him with a cigarette carton shaped box. Inside he found crayons, paper, maybe a sailboat or a car, and a comb, washcloth and soap. This is operation Friendship Box. These have been carefully and lovingly packed by Junior Red Cross members—grade school children who asked themselves: "If I were by myself and I was scared, and somebody gave me a box, what would I like to find?"
