New High Price Index

Higher transportation and housing costs pushed the Detroit Consumer Price Index for November to a new high of 116.0, up four-tenths of one per cent from October.

Consumer goods and services which cost $10 in 1957-58 now cost $11.60, according to the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The index is 2.9 per cent higher than a year ago.

Thomas J. McArdle, regional director of the Chicago office, reported that average transportation costs rose 1.1 per cent in the Detroit area from October to November. Higher prices for both new and used cars account for most of that increase.

Higher mortgage interest rates are responsible for part of the half per cent rise in housing costs.
