

Researchers Find British Race Resentment

LONDON -- A British Broadcasting Corporation research team surprised itself by discovering an under-the-surface current of resentment of Britishers towards non-white immigrants.

The researchers uncovered the first concrete evidence that millions of average Britons resented the heavy influx of Indians, Pakistanis, West Indians and other non-whites since the war.

The discontent was there, just beneath the surface of the cozy tolerance Britain likes to present to the world, but it lacked a national voice.

ON SATURDAY, April 20, Enoch Powell, defense spokesman in the Conservative Party's "shadow cabinet" gave it one.

The theme of his speech was "Keep Britain White" or face interracial violence as bloody as that in the United States. Powell called for the end of immigration and for government aid to any immigrant now in the country who wanted to return to his homeland.

Newspapers and TV commentators accused Powell of rabble-rousing.

Conservative Leader Edward Heath fired him from the shadow cabinet. Members of the House of Commons denounced him.

But newspapers which attacked Powell admitted letters from readers were heavily in his favor.

POWELL HIMSELF had tens of thousands of letters of approval against a few hundred of criticism. Thousands of longshoremen and other workers went on strike or marched to Parliament in support of his right to "free speech."

Government immigration officers at London airport broke the civil service code to charge publicly that there was racketeering in illegal entry of colored immigrants. One newspaper estimated 50,000 Indians and Pakistanis alone have no legal right to be in the country.

As leaders of 20 colored immigrant groups hastily formed a "Black People's Alliance" to combat racialism and to protect themselves by force if necessary, there was one conspicuous casualty: the cherished British belief that race violence on the American pattern "couldn't happen here."

The depth of feeling about the race problem is hard to assess in the absence of nationwide polls since Powell spoke. But the BBC put some questions to a studio audience carefully chosen to represent a cross-section of viewers in the Midlands, where the bulk of the immigrants are centered.

Eighty four per cent were against legislation such as the Race Relations Bill, supported by most members of Parliament, which makes it an offense to discriminate on the grounds of race.

Since all three main political parties, presumably reflecting the opinion of the bulk of the country, have strongly supported civil rights legislation, leaders have been asking what went wrong.

THE ANSWER seems to be that too many immigrants arrived too soon, that successive British governments miscalculated the numbers eligible for entry and the strain their arrival would place on housing, employment and the health services.

There are just under one million colored immigrants in Britain, about two per cent of the total population. Some 350,000 are from the West Indies, 250,000 from India, 150,000 from Pakistan, 110,000 from Africa and 80,000 other Asians.

The number swell by more than 40,000 immigrants a year. The number of entry permits has been cut down year after year until it is less than 4,000 for this year. But the numbers of dependents claiming entry on each permit has risen from two in 1962 to 10 in 1967. It was the dependent factor that led the immigration officers to charge "corruption and deceit."

There are as many white immigrants as colored in Britain. (500,000 Irish alone have entered since 1945) but they evidently do not present the same problem.

"Today's Asian arrivals," said the Sunday Telegraph, "are preponderantly alien not only in race but in the nature of their civilization and in religion and deep rooted customs."

Some 10,000 Sikhs are planning to march on 10 Downing Street this month to protest a ban by the city of Wolverhampton on the wearing of turbans and beards while on duty on the municipal buses. The Wolverhampton Transport Committee claims the Sikhs all agreed to wear regulation uniforms when hired.

Some politicians see Powell's speech as his challenge to Heath for leadership of the Conservative Party. They are worried at the ugly passions unleashed.

Among Powell's supporters were opportunist remnants of the British Fascists who defaced British politics before the war and are trying to rise again.
