EDITORIAL

LAST DEADLINE

This edition of The Farmington Enterprise marks the close of the Blue and White section for another year.

We have tried to make the Blue and White live up to all the standards of good journalism.

The aim of our paper has been to give the readers of The Enterprise the fullest possible coverage of all school news and events. We have praised and criticized in our editorials; praised because some people or an organization deserved credit for a particular act performed; criticized only in a kindly effort to inform people of needed adjustments at school.

Our staff has enjoyed publishing the Blue and White. We hope that you have derived as much pleasure from reading it and will continue to do so in the following years.

SENIOR GIRLS STATE P. G. PLANS FOR IMMEDIATE FUTURE

By Bob Kettler

Now warm days this spring have been harder to discover than the ham in a night club sandwich. But last week, happening to come on one, unexpectedly, we straightway let down the top of our '31 Studebaker Convertible and took us a ride through the countryside, being much interested in the growing of oats and wheat and potatoes. If some other man does the work. What took our eye, more than anything though, was the number of bars with beer or tobacco signs plastered over their sides. Now we never, or hardly ever, push our snout in another man's business, but it struck us that those farmers would have been much ahead if they had used all that advertising space to say "Drink Milk" or "Eat More Butter" as the sale of these products, in many cases, enables the man to keep the farm and drink that advertised beer. Well, but he never was in a tavern or cigar store, or saw a brewery that had a big "Drink More Milk" sign anywhere on the premises.

We know there has never been a product of any sort that could not use all the promotion it could get, but sometimes we're in doubt as to how we should promote this wonderful '51 Studebaker V-8 Commander. If we get too truthful and tell how marvelous the car really is, people will start tapping their foreheads and saying, "Look who is off his rocker." So the best we can do is tighten the cinch on our typewriter and say - "It's the thrill ride of '51!" - but you gotta drive it to discover that. "It's amazingly comfortable!" - and that one is easy, just relax on those cushions, but don't fall asleep. The easiest way to sell a Studebaker is to have you drive it, so why not arrange for a demonstration? You'll be most happy that you did.

Comes now the time when a lot of graduates will discover they must do their own growing - no matter how big their father is.

So the other day, a little lady we know, who has been getting a new Studebaker every third year for the last thirty years, brought her car in for a tune-up and an oil around lubrication, she being of a mind the better the care, the better the car. While her Studebaker was in the hands of our most capable mechanics she does a bit of chitchat with us and remarks that twenty years ago, the woman who bolted potatoes with the jackets on was regarded as being too lazy to peel them. Proving, she observed, is wonderful. Today when some one does the same thing, she's being scientific and is conserving the natural minerals and vitamins of the vegetable.

Well we must go now, but we read a report the other day, which said at least six million people in this country were too poor to get married. The report is a bit too late, we figure, because at today's prices at least twice that many all ready are!

Yours,
BOB KETTLER

Duck Bands Held Sacred By Columbian Indians

Another Trader Horn might solve this problem. Duck identification bands, from birds presumably tagged in the United States, are lying in a little pile in a remote Columbian Indian village, but a federal fly-way biologist has been unable to negotiate a deal to even get close to them.

These South American Indians consider the bands sacred, according to Ted Shanks, Missouri conservation biologist, who received the report.
