WHY COLLEGE!

Joe Smith just graduated from a large mid-western university. He majored in psychology. He worked hard for four years. His parents scrimped for ten to send him to college. Now he is unemployed.

A familiar story perhaps. Everyone knows one. Some even state that a college education is a waste of time because it doesn't provide a guarantee of employment. But who ever said it should.

College is not a sophisticated and expensive technical school. It wasn't meant to be and hopefully it hasn't become one. A liberal arts education provides the student with much more than the mechanics for earning a buck. The major goal of a Liberal Arts program must be to stimulate in each student resourcefulness, an understanding of change, and a respect for learning. A good liberal arts education familiarizes the student with a variety of disciplines. It trains him to cope with problems in a broad spectrum of fields. The curriculum is generally designed to enable students to have an understanding of areas other than their own and to be able to communicate with individuals in different fields.

The student is exposed to the great masters in music and art. He becomes acquainted with the great minds of past and present centuries. He tries to understand the great physical forces of our world and the intricacies of the human intellect.

The most important thing the student learns in college is that he knows nothing. Nothing compared to what man has learned. Nothing compared to what man has thought and accomplished.

College students may major in a specific field but the general theory behind each planned curriculum is the same. Learn to think. Learn to solve problems. Learn to be more sensitive and tolerant and then learn to make a living.
