Process of Making Blood.
Nature's process of making blood is interesting. Briefly, it is on this wise: When the stomach and other alimentary organs have completed their digestive work the blood-forming material is absorbed by innumerable little mouths, and conducted through a maze of assimilating glands to a storage pocket in the regions of the kidneys. From this receptacle the refined blood material passes upward through a long goose-quill-sized tube emptying into a great vein between the neck and the heart. The heart receives this crude, rich blood and pumps it into the lungs, where it is oxygenated and purified. Then the life-sustaining stream returns to the heart to be forced out to the remotest tissues of the body.

"CASE" CARS

In conceiving and producing this car, we have had just one thing in view—viz., to build a car that combines all of those elements that you know to be necessary. This means not only a powerful motor, a good-looking body, complete equipment, but it means those little things for the convenience and ease in the driving and caring for one's automobile. The first mile you ride in this car will delight you with its unusual comfort. And then when you come to a steep hill or a long, hard pull, you will find the "CASE" motor well deserving of the characterization of "The Motor That Makes Extra Cylinders Unnecessary"—built with a conscientiousness and experience in motor building that has gained for each "Case" car the reputation—"The Car with the Famous E.L.E."
