BOTH CHEAP AND EFFICIENT

Berlin Postal Authorities Have In prevement on the Pneumatic Tube.

An electrical substitute for the pneumatic tube is on trial by the Berlin postal authorities, with prom-ising results. It consists of miniature electric trains running automatically in a tunnel. Each train consists of a locomotive and three cars, and the double-track tunnel in which it runs is six feet wide by 2½ high, with a trench between the two tracks deep enough for a man to walk in. The current is taken from the conductor current is taken from the conductor running along the tunnel roof, and the trains run quite automatically, stopping by means of electric brakes on reaching their destinations. A block system prevents collisions. This system has been actually in use, on an experimental section of track, for some time; and if it is successful, as it seems now likely to be, it will probably be introduced into other European cities.
