NEW COMMUNITY has won an environmental honor award for respecting the natural state of the wooded site.

Environment Respected In New Communities

Most new communities are built around a "theme." It may be leisure living. Or on-site recreation. Or the nostalgia of a rustic yesterday.

But, whatever the specifics, the general appeal is based — not only on good quality homes — but on a better quality of life.

One new community, for instance, is combining the best of the past (authentic Early American architure), the present (up-to-date conveniences) and the future (prize-winning environmental safeguards). It's Wood Creek Courts, a 20-acre complex 30 miles north of Chicago.

The community is planned as eight clusters of seven to 11 homes each. Every cluster will have a common area, such as Bucks County, Tidewater Virginia, Natchez and Nantucket, to which homes within it will scrupulously adhere.

Some of the house designs date back to 1850. But, most of the authentic detail was imaginatively duplicated with modern ponderosa pine woodwork available in stock sizes and a variety of styles at local lumber dealers.

In the Bucks County enclave, for example, homes feature split fieldstone facades, narrow siding and angular roofs.

Entrances are colonial cross-and-bible wood panel doors with decorative side-lights and pediments. Shutters are authentically-styled raised wood panels or louvers.

Wood stairways, mantels and moldings — though stock items — have the hand-some detailing found in original Early American handcraft.

Window selection shows how old world design was merged with modern technology. Traditional double-hungs and "boxed" casements have handy removable grilles which give an elegant small-pane appearance, yet lift right off the glass for easy window cleaning.

The windows are wood sash units with insulating glass, which eliminates the need for storm sash, substantially cuts heat loss and assures year-round comfort.

Their insulating qualities also help conserve energy — an important consideration in this ecology-minded community.

For its environmental concerns, World Creek Courts won an environmental honor award. More than 40 per cent of the wooded site will be left in its natural state. In the building areas, 1,800 trees — some 30 feet tall — were carefully pruned to reduce shock.

Before road and utility sites were selected, test drilling was conducted to locate and protect tree root systems.
