Wickerwork In Polymer

It's increasingly true that things aren't always what they seem to be. Sometimes, in fact, they're a good deal better.

Take, for instance, a brand new five-tier etagere that appears to be constructed of old-fashioned wickerwork and bamboo, coated with sparkling white enamel.

Your assessment would be quite wrong, however, for the wicker etagere described above isn't really wicker or bamboo at all.

Rather, it's the latest in a series of design and engineering achievements by a Traverse City manufacturer of room dividers and occasional furniture.

Applying highly skilled carving and reproduction techniques developed over many years, the company is molding the new 72-inch tall etagere of furniture-quality polymers that offer vast improvements over the wicker of yesteryear.

The clustered column corner design that duplicate painted bamboo stalks, and the 12-by-32-inch shelves that look exactly like fine wicker work, are molded in white material that resists stains and scratches. And they're solid, so they'll never wobble, unwind, or peel.

And there's one more advantage you may appreciate at moving time: KD (knocked down) construction.

Ryegrass Under Trees

Growing grass under trees is usually more difficult than having a good turf in the open.

Certain varieties are rather tolerant of shade, dryness, and the infertile soil typical of shaded habitat - fescues such as Highlight, James-town and Ruby, for example. But whatever the grass, higher than normal mowing under trees gives the grass an advantage.

New evidence suggest that more is involved when trying to hold lawngrass under trees than just reduced light and competition for nutrients and water. At least in some cases the tree roots secrete substances that retard the grass.

In a Florida study roots of silver maple were especially restrictive to bluegrass rooting (even though all the light, moisture, and fertility the grass could use was provided).

Where it is impossible to hold topflight turf under trees, an overseeding each autumn (as the tree leaves are shed) makes sense.

Past-sprouting perennial ryegrasses scratched into thin sod can provide winter cover even though the stand may thin out again next summer.

The new varieties such as Compass, Manhattan, NK-100, NK-200, Polo and Penfine, are bringing acclaim to this often-overlooked species.
