Transportation
Possibilities Investigated

FARMINGTON
Public transportation for Farmington will likely rely on buses and taxis, but an effort is being made to see if service can be improved. City Manager Robert Deadman told the Farmington City Council Monday.

The report was in response to a recent request by William Hartsock to investigate methods of improving public transportation in Farmington.

Southeastern Michigan Transportation Authority (SEMATA) is the only eligible authority in the Detroit area that may receive state or federal transportation funds, Deadman said.

He mentioned bus pools for commuters and improved bus service, as two programs SEMATA was working on, but added Farmington was not included in any of their plans at the moment.

He also said discussion was underway with Suburban Checker Cab Co. to discuss methods of improving the cab service to senior citizens during daylight hours.

In the meantime, he urged publicizing more information on the DSR and Greyhound bus service serving the city of Farmington.

An early morning bus to downtown Detroit costs 95 cents.
