

Feminine gloves right for spring

Feminine fashions have entered the spring sunlight, casting shadows on heavy jewelry, clunky shoes and severe hairstyles. The look is overall femininity and enhancing the soft moods of spring are little white gloves. This season's hand wear revival features some minor changes in style. The short, plain white glove has competition from variety of crocheted, polka dot or striped designs. While the later are mostly accessorizing gimmicks, they can add spunk to an ensemble.

Though styles haven't changed dramatically, the shys and wherefores of wearing gloves have.

Ten years ago long gloves were worn with sleeveless gowns; short gloves were daytime commodities and gloves were always removed at the destination point.

This year, long gloves are nonexistent and short gloves have come into the fashion foreground. They have become a 24-hour accessory, worn with anything for any length of time.

PUT THEM WITH a Chanel suit and the look is proper and dignified. Matched with a sleeveless dress they pull the look together. Even a mid-calf, flowering chiffon gown gains femininity via gloves.

The glove revival will undoubtedly change the nature of other hand-oriented items. Their use finally may bring to an end the era of large, oversized rings. Gloves have to fit and they won't on a hand laden with jewelry.

Further, when gloves are removed dark, dramatic nail polish certainly won't coincide with the look you're trying to convey. Consequently nails may be lighter.

There is, of course, another side to the glove story. Women who bite their nails or do the dishes won't have to spend an evening with hands in their pocket. Gloves are the perfect cover up, if you're willing to wear them through dinner and into dessert.
